Fulton, First, Last and All the Time

James Whitcomb Riley says:

"I have always noticed great success
Is mixed with trouble, more or less,
And it's the one who does the best
That gets more kicks than all the rest."

Watch this space tomorrow. Don't overlook it; it will be well worth reading.

Did you make that promise? Don't forget that FULTON is going to be FULTON during 1916 and not a part of SYRACUSE.

FULTON is your town. Speak well of your town and neighbors. FULTON is just as good as you believe it to be. Do your part and be happy.

Arrived in the City of FULTON and registered at the Clark House is: THE HONORABLE DUES R DUE. Show the gentleman that you are there and make him feel at home in this city.

Have you given these dues consideration? Do you beleive that we can run our business without funds?

Stop your kickin' get a hold
Of the wheel and turn it;
You can never handle gold
'Less yer try to earn it.
Brush the cobwebs from yer eyes,
Stop yer durn repinin'
An' you'll notice that yer skies
Allus 'll be shinin'.
If you hain't the nerve to try,
Sneak away somewhere an' die.

The work of the world is done by few. A part of this work should be done by you.

Conditions in the city of FULTON are going to be better in 1916; we see normal conditions returning to the town and that should make all happy and willing to work and help.

Some turned that new leaf over in a hasty sort of way; others did it slowly, while they were thinking what they were doing, still others hestitated in turning it over; more collapsed while doing it; indifferent ones tore the sheet out; a few sighed; others again laughed, but ALL turned that new leaf, just the same.

Give humanity a chance to better; start with yourself first; then look the others over and try to be and do good.

A design for a Fulton trademark has been draughted by Secretary Hollenga of the Chamber of Commerce.

The units composing the design bear in strong letters U. S. A., and the words "Everything the best—Made in Fulton, New York. An eagle with outstretched wings join the whole.

Mr. Hollenga states he gained his idea from the design composed for the Detroit Chamber of Commerce, which was the winner of the $500 prize offered in the Detroit contest.

In a short time it is possible that every package leaving Fulton will carry a sticker bearing the design described.

EARLY BIRDS CAUGHT SMOKES ON FREDENBURGH

"Why smoke your pipe, when you can have a cigar on me," was the way Fireman James Fredenburgh greeted the early birds in the business section this morning, the occasion being in honor of a young son born at the Fredenburgh home at 7 o'clock this morning. The passing of cigars was the father's mild way of expressing his pleasure, and the smokers join in felicitations.

Henry Ford Skeptical About "Preparedness;" Trusts the American

Washington—To those who may be carried away by the cooked-up enthusiasm of the "preparedness" campaign now being conducted throughout thec ountry by the munition interests and those patriotic societies that are misled by insidious influences to see great danger threatening the United States, it is well to consider an editorial printed recently in the Corona (California) Courier. California, be it remembered, is one of thef avorite stamping grounds of the war jingo, where the peril of the Japanese is ever and anon flaunted to stir up "patriotism."

Says this sensible editor, in discussing the political issues of 1916, as quoted in the Literary Digest:

"The issue should not be that old ghost of an issue, the tariff, but rather a return of a truly business administration, run on business principles, with a view of getting greatest returns for the money spent. All this talk of a greater Army and Navy is pure buncombe, and the Administration should be big enough to see the hidden graft. If only the people would do a little thinking for themselves and not let the big dailies do it all!"

Henry Ford, who is vastly interested in the so-called "preparedness" campaign, said recently after reading much about the matter in the newspapers: "I would like to know how much of this patriotic fervor the editors talk about comes from the hearts of the American citizen and how much from the pocketbook of the men who expect to land the contracts for equipping the big military forces proposed. In the first place I think the American knows the country to bein need of no vast armed force, for with that comes the beginning of the end of democracy, and in the second place I think he is too shrewd to permit any such program to be stuffed down his throat by men who are going to make money out of it."

National Polish Relief Gets $35.17, Result Good Citizen's Work

The New Year's campaign conducted by Mr. J. Raymond in the interest of the millions of poor Polish people, in their native land who are starving and near starving, was more than satisfactory from a financial standpoint, as a total of $37.67 was collected by tht gentleman, and this in spite of the handicap afforded by closed stores on a holiday. The only expense incurred by Mr. Raymond was the printing of cards, $2.50, hence the sum forwarded by him this morning to the headquarters in Washington amounted to $35.17.

Mr. Raymond authorizes the statement that there are at present 1,800,000 Polish women, children and old persons victims of famine due to the war, and 4,000,000 more standing at the brink of the grave, and 6,000,000 more are standing at the gate of the grave. In addition to this it is reported that the living are eating domestic animals and even the bark of trees in their desperation.

The Polish residents of the city are deeply grateful to the President of the United States for his proclamation invoking the aid of sympathizers, and to the people of Fulton who responded to the appeal as contained in The Evening Times of Friday last. While the first stage of the relief campaign closed Saturday, the charitably inclined are besought to come forward with contributions which will be forwarded to the Washington headquarters for relief.

Following is a list of contributors to the fund, at $1 each:

T. H. Marvin, Wm. J. Bogue, Mr. Englehardt, P. J. O'Brien, J. W. Stevenson, G. B. Fairman, L. Romas, S. O'Kominski, L. Wiliaszek, J. Chlebica, F. Wawzonek, J. Cieplinski, S. Witowski, F. Josek, F. Gladys, J. Raymond, Mrs. M. Raymond, J. Bilaski, T. Jasek, A. Borek, M.Gryszuwke, P. J. Okonewski.

The collections were held by, Miss Mary Okoniewski, Frances Kranczyk, Smilie Gladys, Mary Witowska, Mary Lmarysh, Helen Lejder.

THE VOICE OF MANY CITIZENS

Editor Fulton Times:

Speaking for a large number of our voters permit us to take this opportunity to extend through your columns to our newly installed city administration the most cordial greetings of this new year. Mr. Mayor Lewis, you may take it from us that we wish to extend to you and your official family every possible aid that may be demanded of Fulton-loving, and generous-minded citizens.

We did not accomplish all that we thought we wanted to in the last election, but, to a man our company swings into line and shall endeavor to keep step with our public officers so long as they render conscientious and efficient service. We ask that you give us your best efforts toward securing a degree of economy that shall be consistant with dignity and respect. We want every dollar of our public money to be spent for its legitimate purpose. We demand that you shall pry loose the grafter's hand from our city treasury if he gets a grip upon it. We look for such an enforcement of the law as shall make our city morally clean. We expect that you will exact a due compliance with the law relating to the observance of Sunday. We believe that you will remember that you are the public servant of the humblest as well as of the most influential citizen and that each one of us has his rights that you are bound to respect.

There is much between the lines of recent reports regarding our city's finances that may well occupy your attention. We believe that the conditions indicated in these reports will not continue. We do not wish to offer any captious criticisms nor would we thrust upon you any unsought and hence unwelcome advice or suggestions, but rather to most heartily assure you of our unstinted co-operation and support in all good impulse and effort.

In conclusion we offer this slogan for the new administration, "Safety First, Fulton Next."

Spokesman for many citizens.

Meeting of Assessors is Opposed by County Officials in the State

The Home Rule Tax association which conducted a campaign to defeat the tax article of the new Constitution, since the constitutional convention adjourned is receiving complaints from county officials throughout the state concerning the expense forced upon towns in sending assessors to the Albany conference January 12 and 13.

Francis A. Willard, secretary of the association, condemned the action of the state board of tax commissioners in calling such a conference when it is the duty of the commissioners or their representatives to visit the counties and advise on taxation matters. Mr. Willard said it looked like another effort by the state authorities to interfere with tax affairs of localities and saddle unnecessary expense on nearly 1,000 towns in thes tate without their consent.

Secretary Willard said he had just received a resolution adopted unanimously by the Wayne county board of supervisors protesting gagainst the expense to that county of sending forty-five local assessors to Albany.

"It is much cheaper," reads one part of the resolution, "for one man from the state board of tax commissioners to visit the county than foro forty-five Wayne county assessors to go to Albany, when the same effect can be accomplished by the tax commission visiting the county as has been done for many years."

Mr. Willard says while it might be a small expense for local assessors in nearby counties to attend the conference, the cost of such a trip for assessors from remote counties like Chautauqua, Cattaragus, Allegany, Erie, Wyoming and Steuben would be considerable.

The law requiring the local assessors to attend a state conference at least once in two years was passed at the last session of the legislature. It require that the traveling and other necessary expenses be borne by the towns.

Those who were responsible for the new law defended it on the ground of the necessity for bringing the stateb oard of tax commissioners and local assessors together, the idea being to promote uniformity in assessments in all towns of the state. It is argued that this can better be accomplished by having all the local assessors meet with them embers of the state board than to meet them by counties.

Governor Whitman has been invited to address the conference in Albany. It is also considered probable that Senator Ogden L. Mills, chairman of the legislative committee which has been investigating tax matters all over the state, will address the assessors and give his ideas of how property should be taxed.

PITILESS PUBLICITY

What has become of Mr. Wilson's program of "pitiless publicity?" This was to be one of the chief features of his administration. All the bad old ways of secrecy and subterfuge were to be abandoned. "Let us take counsel together" was the new motto. Yet in the event no president has ever bestowed less of his confidence upon the people. Them ysterious mission of Colonel House is imperfectly explained by the statement that he is to have a heart-to-heart talk with some of the American ambassadors in Europe. It is difficult to understand what he can say to them that the State Department could not have said. Are they puzzled by the foreign policy of the administration and is he to offer them a more intimate glimpse of the presidential mind? Have they not done their duty to the satisfaction of Washington and is he to warn or reprove? Publicity on this point pitiless or other, would be welcome. The "personal representative" of the president is no part of our system o government; but Mr. Wilson seems to have an especial fondness for this form of action.—Philadelphia Ledger.

HYPHENATED ANGLO-SAXONS

They're dropping the hyphen, we see. Did you ever stop to think that the first hyphen hoisted in this country was the hyphen in Anglo-Saxon?

It was. Years back, when the high tide of immigration began to people New England with strangers to the Minute Men, a few Boston magazines and highbrow newspapers began prating of the "Anglo-Saxon virtues" which were being swept aside by the influx of Europeans that knew them not.

The superiority affected by this small bunch in the Boston neighborhood was reflected in the columns of a large number of yap newspapers in other parts of the country. The term "American" took second place to "Anglo-Saxon."

Now it happens that a large part of Americans are not Anglo-Saxons at all—even Americans who settled the 13 original colonies. The Dutch in New York, the Swedes and Germans in Pennsylvania and Delaware, the French in the Carolinas, the Spanish in Georgia, were just as American as the Anglo-Saxons around Back Bay. And their countrymen who came in after years make just as good Americans as the immigrants from the British Isles.

With all the talk about Anglo-Saxons, then, is it any wonder that Americans of other blood-strains should emphasize their origin, in such words as German-American, Spanish-American, Italian-American, etc? We think it isn't.—Reading, (Pa.) Telegram.

Cobweb For Transit Cross Hairs.

Broken cross hairs in surveyor's transits can be replaced with spider web. The lens should be removed and the shellac cut out of the notches in which the ends of the cross hairs terminated. A length of spider silk should be carefully removed from a spider's web and mounted in the notches with thin shellac. Care should be taken that the fingers do not come in contact with the spider silk, as the acid from the human skin quickly destroys the delicate fiber.—Popular Science Monthly.

GIVE THE MAYOR BACKING

On this the first day of business in the new year our little city is in the hands of a new set of officials, some of them elective and the remaining ones the appointees of the new mayor, Mr. Victor C. Lewis.

Mayor Lewis stands today before the people of Fulton ready and willing to do their bidding. His sincerity in this respect is not for a moment doubted by the women and men who want for the city the best conditions obtainable, but right here the question is raised, will the system of government under which we are working permit of removing from the pathway of progress the many obstacles to a proper administration of the people's business. It is quite natural that we should feel skeptical upon this subject, but yet why not look for the best in the storeroom of the new administration. Why not expect better things from the Lewis administration than we have known in former days? Why not indeed? While Mayor Lewis is confronted with conditions bordering upon chaos, and while he may find before many weeks elapse that his burden is a heavy one, a load too heavy to carry with any degree of comfort, he is after all master of the difficult situation. He is the man of the hour in Fulton. He can make or unmake for himself a record as a man of business and a clean, honest city official. Mayor Lewis is a neighbor of the man next door, and next door to that man. He is a life-long resident of our city and should be acquainted with every condition which has brought municipal affairs to the present deplorable state. Equipped as he must be in this and other respects he should feel armed up to a certain degree to meet his tasks. We say degree advisedly, for as everybody knows a public official to give efficient service must be made to feel that when he faces a crisis it will be possible for him to square his shoulders and brace his back against that strongest of strong budwarks—the wall formed by thec ombined sentiment of decent, self-respecting people. It is quite easy for us to criticise an condemn an official's misstep, but how many of us stand in line ready to be led in an assault against the men whose greed for power and emoluments knows no boundaries, and whose lack of decent principles makes of them the worst agencies in our system of government.

Mayor Lewis, The Evening Times wants to be your friend in need. We felicitate you at the outset of your administration, with the hope added that we may witness during the next two years Fulton's greatest revival in civic matters.

RAILWAYS AND INDUSTRIALS

There was announced yesterday the receivership of another railway, and The Wall Street Journal printed a list of twenty industrials which made extraordinary distributions, adding that was the average of increased disbursements through December. The contrast thus made apparent is not to be evaded by conditions applicable to any one corporation in either class. No doubt there has been bad railway financing, but what shall be said of stock dividends to industrials last week ranging up to 100 perc ent.? Is it not clear that the money of investors will go where such returns are to be had? Is it not equally clear that, however desperately investors may cling to old investments, they will be chary of risking more where nothing above mortgage returns is forbidden?

It is well known how such conditions have been produced in the railway industry. The courts have ruled that rates could not be reduced below a minimum which the law allowed. That minimum above confiscation has become the standard, or the maximum, in the customary manner, and railways must operate accordingly. But there has been no such oversight of railway costs. We quoted recently from The Railway Age Gazette some moderate comparisons of railway costs and earnings for two periods before and after the latest increase of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission over railway rates. Stronger figures are given by the Bureau of Railway News.

In the eight years before 1906 railway earnings increased 94 per cent.; wages increased 88 per cent.; taxes increased 70 per cent. In the eight years since 1907 earnings increased 31 per cent.; wages increased 48 per cent.; taxes increased 82 per cent.

That makes it clear where the railway profits have gone irrespective of bad administration or culpable finance. It is not necessary to earn dividends. Wages and taxes cannot be "passed." The increase of earnings has been reduced by authority. The increase of costs has been partly by authority, and partly by public opinion equally coercive. Only the strongest railways have been able to survive, there being much over two billions of railway securities in default. No doubt in these latter cases there were cumulative causes which call for censure in individual instances. That does not alter the fact that, broadly speaking regarding classes of securities, public authority must share the responsibility for the hard conditions of the railways industry, and a tendency toward monopoly through the drift of the bankrupt small railways into larger control. The railway conspirators never dreamed of such wrecking as we are witnessing in part by law, and never created such opportunities for picking up links to piece out their systems as now exist.

This is an unexpected by-product of regulation, and requires thinking over. Regulation was designed to curb monopoly, not to promote it. The intent was to regulate rates according to reason and morality, not for the sake of reducing profits. The result is that American capital is available for development of railways in foreign lands, but that railway development in the United States is far below the growth and the need of the country. How many railway shares have been issued in Massachusetts under the requirement that they cannot be issued at a discount? How many miles of new railway have been built in New York under the new regime? What are the conditions throughout the Southwest, where several railway commissions are combining against the liberality of the Federal Commission? These questions suggest that the State regulation is worse than the Federal, and that between the two the railways suffer the lawful "fifty stripes save one."—N. Y. Times.

THE RURAL SCHOOL AND THE FARMER

In order to be of some service to the farmers of his community and in order to connect up the school work with practical things on the farm, the principal of the school at Winter, Wis., Mr. E. J. Schmeichel, has given notice that the agricultural department of the school will test milk and cream free of charge for the farmers of that vicinity. It is Mr. Schmeichel's hope that eventually they may be able to form a testing club or a cow testing association.

Rural schools are finding it desirable in increasing numbers to take up this class of work, and it is only to be regretted that more of them have not yet seen the value of so doing. The school teacher that desires money for a better school house, additions to her equipment, or any other thing that she believes will add to the efficiency of her work, can get all these things as soon as she can arouse the interest of the men who pay the taxes and give them visible evidence of the value of the school to the community.

The rural school teacher may well follow in the footsteps of the large state universities that are ever seeking additional appropriations for carrying on their educational work. They can point out the advantages of education and how well their school is carrying on its instructional work, yet when they really want the money they point out the visible and tangible results that have been secured. And they most often look to the agricultural department to find these forcible illustrations of what has been done. Here the results are easily analyzed and apparent. They have force and effect, and their citation brings results.

The same means are at hand for the rural school teacher, and if the teacher has the ability the same results can be secured. The American voter will unloose his purse strings when he is convinced that real service will be rendered. This conviction may not be established in one year, sometimes not in two years, but if real service is given it will be eventually accomplished. We have tried this out in our own community, and we have seen it done in others.

Let the farmer's cow nose her way into the school room, and the farmer will follow after. Connect up the farm and the school in a visible and direct manner, and both will profit by the acquaintanceship.—Hoard's Dairyman.

Need of Contrast In Beauty.

An essential prerequisite to all beauty is contrast. To obtain artistic effect light must be put in juxtaposition with shade, bright colors with dull, a fretted surface with a plain one. Forte passages in music must have piano passages to relieve them, concerted pieces need interspersing with solos, and rich chords must not be continuously repeated. This general principle will, I think, explain the transformation of the bygone useful into the present beautiful. It is by virtue of their contrast with our present modes of life that past modes of life look interesting and romantic.—Herbert Spencer.

AMERICANS AIDING FRANCE'S BLIND

Victims of War Are Being Taught Trades.

WINIFRED HOLT ACTIVE.

She Went to Paris After the Outbreak of War and Succeeded In Gathering Funds Among American Friends to Carry on Work—Keeping Away Despondency Big Task.

Paris.—Blind for life is the fate that has overtaken many of France's sons who have not been permitted to offer their lives on the altar of patriotism.

Trench warfare, the concussion of huge artillery, poisonous gases, flaming tar, have all contributed to cause wounds in the head, only too often resulting in total blindness.

American initiative again has stepped to the fore. A group of Americans have banded themselves into a committee to assist in teaching the blind. Miss Winifred Holt, well known in America for her work with the blind in the Lighthouse in New York city, was the originator of the idea.

She was in London when the war broke out as American delegate to the international congress of the blind in that city. Realizing what great opportunities the war offered to aid those who have been rendered sightless, she came to Paris and succeeded in gathering sufficient funds among American friends to carry on a limited amount of work with the soldiers.

"The darkest moments in a soldier's life are those when for the first time he realizes that he never will be able to see again," Miss Holt recently declared. "Without prompt expert assistance soon after the loss of sight the blind man is apt to become despondent, to lose his intelligence or to drift into an apathy from which it is difficult if not impossible to rouse him.

"The committee's first task is to find the blind sufferers, some of whom are marooned in improvised hospitals, farm houses or chateaux, and many of whom are congregated in the large hospitals or Red Cross stations. The committee sends visitors and teachers to these blind soldiers, and for those otherwise physically able it starts the task of 'putting eyes on their finger tips' and giving them light through work."

The ministry of war has just given a special building to be used entirely for the instruction of the blind. Many blind teachers have come forward and offered their services to Miss Holt to serve under her guidance. A class in instruction is held every morning in one of the large hotels. The men come here to start their lives over again.

Typewriters and stenographic machines especially constructed for the blind have been imported from America for their instruction. The men are taught the "touch" typewriting system, similar to that taught in many of our large business schools and colleges.

For ordinary writing and reading the International Braille raised letter system is used. The letters resemble the Morse telegraphic code in that they are a series of dots and dashes, punched through heavy parchment-like paper by a stylus. Checkerboards, playing cards, musical instruments, rattan for basket weaving, modeling clay and watches, all specially made for the blind, have been brought from America. A large consignment of games and writing materials which kind friends sent to Miss Holt to enable her to continue her work were lost on the Lusitania.

Speaking of her work with the men, Miss Holt said "My friends have been very kind in holding up my hands, and the authorities have given us every support. We are working in twenty-seven military hospitals and have a large waiting list of men who are able to be about and who wish to come to our 'school' as soon as it is opened. My staff of teachers, all of whom are necessarily French, have been most successful in their efforts."

Dog Trees Big Bobcat.

Salt Lake City.—A 22 caliber poodle dog treed a 45 centimeter bobcat near the tank house of the city waterworks in Parley's canyon and kept him in a state of siege on the top of a telephone pole until the feline was shot by Louis Shricker, caretaker at the tank house.

SOCIABLE PENGUINS.

Visits Not Appreciated by Explorers in the Antarctic.

R. E. Priestley of Captain Scott's antarctic expedition relates an amusing experience with Adelie penguins off Flagstaff point. The Terra Nova had landed a party to take off geological specimens, but the men had some difficulty in keeping the penguins away from the boat.

As we lay alongside the ice foot, says the author in his "Antarctic Adventure," we blocked the birds' access to their rookery, but that did not seem to bother the penguins in the least. They would rise out of the water a few yards off, take a glance at the boat, which they doubtless took for a stranded floe, and then disappear. From previous experience I knew what was coming and looked with interest for the next act, but the boatman who was helping me get the specimens on board was new to the vagaries of the Adelie.

I was unable to judge which was the more surprised, the sailor or the penguins, when the latter landed, half a dozen at a time, upright in the bottom of the boat. Certainly the penguins were most annoyed, and directly they found that they were trapped they assaulted the poor man with unreasoning fury, so that it was no easy matter to pitch them back into the sea.

It was on a similar occasion that an Adelie penguin, seeing what he thought was a handy piece of ice, leaped out of the water and landed on the knees of the boatswain who was in the stern. He looked the man in the face, gave one hysterical squawk of horror and shot into the sea. I have never seen a face show greater astonishment than that of our respected boatswain unless it were the penguin's.

Uniform Made a Hit.

The first Confederate uniform ever worn in a southern theater after the war was the one used by a young actor, himself the son of a Confederate soldier, for the first performance of "Held by the Enemy," by William Gillette and his company in Richmond, Va. That was in 1886. The appearance of the gray uniform, even when worn by one who had no lines to speak, was the signal for deafening applause in the audience, much to the surprise of the actors, who had grown so accustomed to it as to forget its significance.—Chicago News.

A Canary's Ears.

A canary's ears are back of and a little below its eyes. They are not hard to find when one has learned where to look. There is no outer ear, such as animals have, but simply a small opening which is covered by feathers. It is quite surprising that birds should possess the very acute hearing which they do, while lacking the fleshy flap which enables the animals to catch sounds.—St. Nicholas.

TOOK FRANKLIN'S ADVICE.

Then Paul Jones Named His New Ship After "Poor Richard."

In his autobiography Franklin tells how he utilized "the little spaces that occurred between the remarkable days" in his almanac to contain "proverbial sentences, chiefly such as inculcated industry and frugality as the means of procuring wealth, and thereby securing virtue, it being more difficult for a man in want to act always honestly, as, to use here one of these proverbs, 'it is hard for an empty sack to stand upright.'"

Most of these proverbs were borrowed from "the wisdom of many ages and nations," as Franklin himself acknowledges, but not a few of them seem to be due to his own witty wisdom, and that just quoted appears to be one of these. Taken as a whole the sayings of Poor Richard range rather with the lowly proverb than with the more elevated and more incisive aphorism, and Morley chose to dismiss them with curt contempt as "kitchen maxims about thrift in time and money."

Yet the saying about the empty sack rises a little above the level of the kitchen maxim, and so does that other which declares that "If you would have your business done, go; if not, send."

One of Franklin's biographers records that when Paul Jones, after his victory in the Ranger, went to Brest to await the new ship which had been promised him, he was tormented for months by excuses and delays despite his appeals to Franklin, to the royal family and to the king himself. Then at last he chanced to pick up "Poor Richard," and the saying just quoted hit home. He took the hint, "hurried to Versailles, and there got an order for the ship which he renamed in honor of his teacher, Bon Homme Richard."—Brander Matthews in Harper's Magazine.

Exactly So.

LETTER IN MAILS 55 YEARS.

Son of Addressee Gets Missive of "Good Abe Lincoln's" Day.

Los Angeles, Cal.—A letter written by the Rev. Samuel Ward of Neoga, Ill., Nov. 6, 1860, the day he cast a ballot for "good Abe Lincoln," was received through the mails here recently by Professor W. B. Ward of Occidental college, a son of H. O. Ward of Zanesville, O., the man to whom it was addressed. Where the letter went after it was mailed will remain a mystery.

The next postmark after that of Neoga in 1860 is that of College Station, N. Y., Aug. 23, 1910. The letter reached Zanesville last October and after a search had been made for the addressee was forwarded here to Professor Ward, who lacks three days of being as old as the letter.

FREAK APPLE TREE.

Blossoms Half and Half at Its Sweet Will In Orchard Near Marion, Va.

Marion, Va.—This seems to be a season of freakish manifestations in garden and apple orchards of southwest Virginia. One of the most peculiar of these manifestations occurred on a farm a short distance east of Marion.

An apple tree which heretofore had borne its fruit in the natural and accepted manner blossomed in the spring on one half of the tree only, not a bloom appearing on the opposite half. Late in the summer, after the first crop of fruit had matured and been harvested, the tree blossomed on the second half, the fruit maturing in the usual manner.

HIDE ON THE DOOR.

Ends Modern Tale of Wolf That Was Too Greedy.

Minneapolis.—The fable of the greedy wolf that went once too often to the farmer's pasture became a reality here when one of the beasts evaded armed guards in Richfield and Bloomington and came to the city for his third helping of young duck at the home of Carl Hebner.

Mr. Wolf's hide is now curing on Hebner's chicken house door, while his pelt and claws are ready to be taken to the county auditor for a bounty.

Tortoise Shell.

Tortoise shell, however old, can be kept bright by polishing it occasionally with rouge powder.

Among those also who have taken to wearing the Charley Chaplin mustache may be mentioned several of Carranza's bunch, evidence that some Mexicans are Americanizing, all right.

An authority on fads says that the slouch so popular with some young women is to be cut out. Well if the society grin which crops out before the camera would also fade.

Owing to scarcity of the right kind of steel for ribs, umbrellas may go higher. However, that fact won't worry those who have a long reach on rainy days.

An old song ran, "Uncle Sam is rich enough to give us all a farm." All the same just when the farmers are the richest ever Uncle Sam's pocketbook is empty.

While putting millions into preparedness against a possible outside foe, it is well not to overlook the foe we have always with us, the white plague.

The German type of "trained citizenry" won't go here, but we do want the training and the citizenry to get together somehow and keep together.

One good thing Booker T. Washington stood for in this age of universal restlessness—that is, "Stay at home—stay on the land."

At the windup, which of the belligerents will take the Balkans as a gift and agree to keep them pacified?

CONGRESS HAS MANY CIVIL WAR VETERANS

Former Soldiers of Union and Confederacy Now Fourteen.

Washington.—Scattered through the membership of the house of representatives, so far as autobiographies in the Congressional Directory disclose, are three men who served in the Union army and three men who served in the Confederate army. In the senate there are five former Union soldiers and three former Confederate soldiers.

A few years ago a much larger percentage of the house and senate members was composed of veterans of the war of '61 to '65. The latest directory furnishes the names of the old soldiers as follows:

Representatives Ebenezer J. Hill of Connecticut, Isaac R. Sherwood of Ohio and David A. Hollingsworth of Ohio, all of whom served in the Union army.

Representatives Albert Estopinal of Louisiana, J. Fred C. Talbott of Maryland and Charles M. Stedman of North Carolina of the Confederate army.

Senators John H. Bankhead of Alabama, Benjamin R. Tillman of South Carolina and Thomas B. Catron of New Mexico are the members of the senate who fought on the side of the south.

The senators who served in the northern army were John D. Works of California, Henry A. du Pont of Delaware, Knute Nelson of Minnesota, Nathan Goff of West Virginia and Francis E. Warren of Wyoming.

Senator Thomas S. Martin and Representative William A. Jones, both of Virginia, were cadets at the Virginia Military institute during the war and were called out for service in some of the Virginia campaigns.

Every congress naturally has a "kid member," and that honor in the Sixty-fourth congress has fallen to Representative Sydney E. Mudd of La Plata, Md. Mr. Mudd was born June 20, 1885, and, therefore, is thirty years old. He is the youngest member of congress. But Mr. Mudd is not the youngest man to be elected to a congress.

Representative Pat Harrison of Mississippi, a member of the present house, was only twenty-nine years old when he came to Washington in his official capacity the first time. He is now only thirty-four years old, though he is entering upon his third term.

California has more political parties represented in its delegation in congress than any other state. In the house the Pacific coast state has three members who describe themselves as Republicans.

There are three Democrats, one Independent, two Progressives, one Progressive-Republican and one Prohibitionist.

Blows Up Money.

Ashland, Ore.—Workmen employed on the ditch of the Rogue River Canal company recently set off a charge of dynamite under a stump, and the air was filled with dollars and half dollars. The blast uncovered a money cache that had been buried there since the early sixties.

History.

"Is it true, madam," said I, meeting History upon the street, "that you repeat yourself?"

"Surely," she replied, smiling sweetly. "I find that if I repeat myself persistently by sheer force of reiteration I sooner or later come to believe myself."—New York Times.

He Knows Them.

"Do you have many perquisites come to your office?"

"No, sir," said he. "The janitor throws them kind of people out."—Baltimore American.

Chopping Him Off.

"I don't want to interfere with your business, but"— began the village bore.

"All right," interrupted Cyrus K. Snapper. "Go ahead and interfere with it."—Judge.

W. C. HUBBARD, MASTER OF GRANGE; PLEADS FOR UNITY OF PURPOSE

Public installation of officers, preceded by one of the famous luncheons prepared by the women of Lower Oswego Falls Grange, occuiped the attention of Grangers in the East 1st st. hall, Saturday afternoon.

Prior to the exercises the vaious officers of the Grange made their annual reports, all of them showing a most satisfactory condition of affairs. Mr. W. C. Hubbard, who was re-elected Master, in addressing the Grange, dwelt in most emphatic terms upon the necessity of co-operation; that without it the Grange cannot prosper. He said that the present prosperous condition of the organization was due entirely to the co-operative work of everybody, and that the great benefits accruing to Grangers by reason of their membership in the society are the result of the co-operative features, such as fire insurance, and the purchase of implements, fertilizers, etc.

The treasurer's report showed a substantial balance existing, which may be added to when the work of the auditing committee is finished, as there are items remaining to be added to the receipts.

Following is a list of the officers installed:

W. C. Hubberd, Master; J. Churchill, Overseer; Miss Mabel Churchill, Lecturer; W. W. Gillespie, Steward; C. B. Anderson, Assistant Steward; Mrs. Elma Pollard, Chaplain; J. H. Stewart, treasurer; Thomas Coles, secretary; W. W. Munroe, gate keeper; Miss Florence Kenyon, Ceres; Miss Ethel Dann, Pomona; Miss Grace Holmes, Flora; Miss Jennie M. Anderson, Lady Assistant Steward; W. H. Pollard, Musician.

For the first time in the Ne wYear the Grange will give one of those suppers to which the hungry, tired business man and women accept invitations, on Saturday, January 8th, from 5 to 8 o'clock.

EVANGELICAL CHURCHES UNITE TO GET FORMER WM. SUNDAY ASSISTANT

"Hitting the Trail" in Fulton will begin on or about April 16th, according to the announcement of the Rev. Dr. Robertson, pastor of the Presbyterian church. The information is the result of a meeting of the official boards of the First and State Street M. E., the Presbyterian, the Baptist and Congregational churches, held yesterday afternoon immediately following vesper services at the Presbyterian church. Later in the evening the official boards met in their respective churches and ratified the action of the afternoon meeting, which was in effect to secure the Rev. Dr. Peacock of Houston, Pa., and a party of three assistants to come here in April for the purpose of conducting tabernacle meetings in a building that will be erected, and which will seat 2500 persons.

The meetings will continue for five weeks and six Sundays, with Dr. Peacock as the leading evangelist. The Doctor will be assisted by Mr. H. C. Warth, chorister and Bible teacher; Mrs. Ora M. Speer extension worker among women, and Mr. L. C. Davidson, secretary to Dr. Peacock.

Dr. Peacock was, for many years Billy Sunday's chief assistant. He separated from theg reat evengelist to take up work on his own account. Later he returned to the Sunday forces, and again became segregated, and for the last three years he has been conducting campaigns on his own account. His latest campaign closed yesterday at Chariton, Iowa, and the next one opens at Fort Plain, N. Y., next Sunday.

COST OF POLICE 5C. PER CAPITA

New York.—That the new year may bring a practical insurance against violent death, property destruction or accident to every man, woman and child in the Empire State by the establishment of a rural mounted police was declared today by officers of the Committee for a State Police, who are receiving at their headquarters here offers of support for this project from grangers, chambers of commerce, protective associations and chiefs of police in every section of the state. At an annual cost of less than five cents apiece to each citizen, this commonwealth can protect from murder, arson, rape, theft, tresspass, fire and flood not only all its residents in the remote country but the people of all its well-policed cities and towns, upon whom criminals may now prey with the assurance of ready refuge in the outlying country, it is estimated. Added services to the state in forest, fish and game protection, highway patrol and sanitary supervision by this proposed patrol of the rural regions would counter balance the cost of the establishment and maintainance of such a public insurance agency on an efficient, non-political basis, it is calculated.

No city or section of the state will be benefited more than any other by the protection of thef orces of mounted men called for in the rural police bill, that has just been framed and will be advocated by a campaign committee made up of leading men in every county. Following the successful plan of the Pennsylvania mounted police, it is recommended that the trained troopers of the rural guard proposed here be divided into troops with headquarters located centrally in the four quarters of this state. From sub-stations, placed throughout the state to cover a radius of twenty-five miles, small detachments of mounted men may constantly patrol the country while one of that number is always stationed at a telephone to receive calls for assistance.

Responding to inquiries from the State Conference of Mayors, which is interesting itself in this subject, the police heads of Newburgh, Oneonta, Port Jervis, Lackawanna and Mechanicsville have already declared that they believe a rural police would render very valuable aid in capturing criminals who take refuge beyond the reach of their forces. Grange leaders and officers of sportsman's organizations throughout the state are also pledging their support for the establishment of a rural guard during the new year. The Association for the Protection of the Adirondacks has just notified the leaders of the new movement that at its last meeting their project was unanimously endorsed by this organization.

"Besides the help to the game wardens which the rural patrol should bring, there is a service to the farmer in protecting him against over zealous sportsmen," said Eleanor H. Johnson, secretary of the Committee for a State Police, at its headquarters, 7 East 42nd Street in this city today. "In one of the reports of the Pennsylvania State Police we notice that about two hundred arrests for tresspass have been made during one year which shows a protection due the farmer and one which is seldom accorded him. Our correspondence shows that practically every locality and every class of residents of the entire state are becoming united in support of this measure, which will benefit equally the people of every section."

DECREASED POPULATION DUE TO LOSS OF TIMBER

Albany—In comparison to the loss in population which Lewis county sustained during the ten years from 1900 to 1910, the past five years has witnessed a gain of 1,098 residents. Five out of the eight villages in the county have added to their population while three are smaller than in 1910. The loss in each case, however, has been small. The county has an alien population of 1,196.

The removal of lumber camps in various parts of Lewis county has probably played an important part in the lessening population. In 1900, the county had a population of 27,427. By 1905, these figures had dropped to 26,643 and according to the Federal census of 1910, there was af urther drop by that year to 24,849.

BOWLERS IN MATCH RACE

The City Bowling league enters into the second half of the present series when the Onyx A. C. and West Side teams oppose each other at the Onyx alleys tomorrow night.

As predicted at thes tart of the series, the six teams are evenly matuhed as is shown by the constant changing of positions in the league standing. The Jogalongs, who occupy the cellar position, are by no means out of the running. Any of the teams suffering reverses in two straight games stand to be passed by the tail-enders providing that team suffers no bad luck.

That the race will prove especially exciting this week is a forgone conclusion as there are foor teams tied for first and second places, these teams being in order the Nondescripts Onyx A. C., N. G.'s, and West Sides.

Several of the teams have postponed matches to bowl in addition to the regular matches, which will also have an effect on the positions of the positions of the teams. The Jogalongs and Crescent A. C., who stand the lowest in the league have bowled their foll quota of games. The other four teams have two postponed matches to take care of.

Van Buren and Chubb were tied for the cash prize awarded to the highest scorer among the league bowlers durin gthe week ending Jan. 1st, with a run of 235 each. Wilson, with 226 pins to his credit, captured the amateus prize for the week.

Story of a Man Who Yearned to Own an Automobile.

HIS CHANCE CAME AT LAST.

It Was Wholly Unexpected and Under Peculiar Circumstances, but the Car, a Beauty, Was His Very Own—Then Came the Saddening Climax.

The fierce joy a poor man feels when he has at last gained possession of an auto he has craved is sometimes a delusion and a snare. I know, for I have experienced said joy.

Anything is likely to happen to a United States marine on his travels around and about this old earth of ours, and it so fell out at the Frisco fire that I became sole owner of a $6,000 touring car for exactly thirty-seven minutes. Rudolph Spreckels, the millionaire sugar refiner, gave it to me, and I don't remember whether I thanked him for it or not. I hope not.

I was on duty at the United States marine barracks on Mare island at the time of the earthquake and fire at San Francisco, and when we got word of the affair we marines made a record breaking dash in a torpedo boat destroyer to the scene of the disaster.

Near the corner of Van Ness avenue and Bush street, at the foot of Lafayette square, stood the million dollar home of Rudolph Spreckels. Some of the marines entered in the course of duty, while I went to the rear and into the garage. There in the garage, flat on his back under the prettiest car you ever laid eyes on, was Rudolph Spreckels, vainly endeavoring to unlock the rear wheel gearing of the machine. Something had locked the rear wheels and had put the car out of commission.

I tried as best I could to assist Mr. Spreckels, but I wasn't of much use considering I'm no mechanician. Then he and I together tried to shove the car through the door of the garage, but halfway through it stuck, and Mr. Spreckels became somewhat discouraged. The fire was nearing his home rapidly, and, as there was no time to lose, he clasped my hand fervently and said, "The car is yours, my boy, if you can save it." Then he made off for the heights of Lafayette square and safety.

For a moment I stood transfixed with the wonder of it all, for I could scarcely realize that the beautiful car was all my own, to do with as I pleased. And then I came out of my dream and gazed at the crippled car stuck fast in the doorway.

Down the street maddened people were hurrying to Lafayette square, dragging their belongings with them, but their shrill cries of terror and apprehension found scarce an answering echo in my heart. I had troubles of my own just then. Six thousand dollars of my money was tied up in that door, and to save it I realized that I must act quickly. It would take at least twenty men to shove that car to the heights of Lafayette square and safety, and I knew that I could look for no assistance from the half crazed people who were scurrying to that vantage point. My marine companions had gone farther down the street on their errands of merciful duty, and I could not look to them for help. But I could not save the car by gazing around helplessly, and I mapped out a plan of action.

I was wearing a big 38 at my side, and I must have been a wonderful figure to the onlookers as, with brandished pistol, I joined the mob on the street, shouting wildly as I ran, "A horse, a horse—me kingdom for a horse!"

My purpose was to impress into my service any automobile or horse I might find and so drag my beauty "six" to Lafayette square. But there was nothing doing. I rushed wildly up and down the street, but the maddened throng paid not the slightest heed to me. Nor could a single horse or auto be seen anywhere. The fire had almost reached Bush and Van Ness streets, and I knew that I had but one chance. Perhaps in Lafayette square was some person who had brought his valuables there by aid of horse or auto power and I might be able to borrow the means of propulsion for a few minutes. Borrow? Heavens! With that six shooter in my starboard mitt, borrow was a mighty poor word. The automobile and fire mania was on me, and I was not responsible.

So, Mercury heeled, I ascended to Lafayette square. Arrived there, I looked down upon the tragic scene below. The fire had reached Van Ness avenue, and as I looked the tiled roofing of the Spreckels home fell in, giving vent to forked flames that shot in and out like serpents' tongues. A few minutes later the tiling on the Spreckels garage gave way, and my beauty "six" lay crushed and buried in the mass of wreckage.

I could look no longer. Heartsick and weary, I wended my way through the crowd gathered in Lafayette square. Then I started down the hill in quest of my comrades.

No, indeed, you never realize what life really means until you have watched the only automobile you ever owned burn up exactly thirty-seven minutes after you began to own it.—Sergeant Raymond Britt, United States Marine Corps.

BOSTON AND ITS NAME.

The City Was Originally Called Trimountain by the Pilgrims.

Boston was not always Boston. The present name of the city is of English origin, but it was originally called Trimountain, a compound Latin name, meaning three mountains. The Pilgrims landed at Plymouth rock in 1620, and when it was determined to found a town on the present site of Boston they christened it Trimountain, in recognition of three conspicuous hills that marked the site.

Of course this awkward name could not last long, and in September, 1630, it was ordered that "Trimountain shall be called Boston," after the borough of that name in Lincolnshire, England, from which several of the prominent settlers had come.

But we have not got to the root of the matter yet, for the English Boston was an abbreviation of Botolph's town, so called from the fact that St. Botolph had founded a monastery there several hundred years before the discovery of America. And so it came about that a legendary saint of the middle ages gave his name to the future literary center of New England.

The kinship of the two Bostons has been recognized on both sides, for in 1851 the mayor sent over a copy of that city's seals, framed in oak from St. Botolph's church, and they now hang in the city hall at Boston. In 1855 a number of Americans, including Charles Francis Adams and Edward Everett, joined in rebuilding part of St. Botolph's church at Boston, England, which had become dilapidated. The part of the old church thus rebuilt by Americans has a tower, called Boston tower, which forms a landmark for forty miles around.—Philadelphia Press.

TRAGEDY OF A GLACIER.

How One of the Victims Came to Have Two Funerals.

In the cemetery at Goschenen in Switzerland a strange burial took place at the end of the nineteenth century. The coffin, a small one, decently and decorously consigned to earth, contained part of a human leg, a boot, some shreds of clothing and 1 franc, 50 centimes of Swiss money. The unusual ceremony was the concluding chapter of a sad history that began on the Rhone glacier eighteen years before.

In the summer of 1882 the burgomaster of Goschenen and two friends undertook the ascent of the glacier. All three lost their lives, and the bodies were found a week later frozen stiff. That of the burgomaster was stuck fast in a crevasse, and in dragging it forth the frozen right leg broke off like a snapped icicle and fell into the blue depths of the fissure. The poor mutilated body was laid away in the cemetery with every honor, for the mayor had been greatly loved and respected in his little community.

The peasants say "Seven years the glacier grows, seven years she melts," and in melting she honestly brings to the mouth of her river all that has fallen down her icy blue throat—a belief that, although partly fanciful, contains much that is true. By this strange operation of nature the leg of the mayor of Goschenen came to light after eighteen years. The boot was still on the foot; some rags of clothing clung to the leg; even the trifling sum of money in the unfortunate man's trousers pocket was honestly returned by the glacier, which keeps nothing not its own.

After eighteen years the leg was buried beside its master. The tragic pathos of its recovery robbed the occurance of all absurdity.—Exchange.

How to Converse With Authors.

I have learned, says a writer in the Atlantic Monthly, that in conversations with authors there should be long pauses. This is because every remark, after being received by the ear, must be submitted to a strict brain analysis and then given a soul bath before it is proper to venture a reply. I have found, also, that in answering too quickly I myself lose caste. I now make it a point never to respond to a question addressed to me by an author until I have counted twenty. If the author is very distinguished I make it fifty for good measure.

In 1430 A. It was of octagonal form, 260 feet in height, with nine stories, each having a cornice and a gallery without.

The Old Year Out and the New Year In

By EDITH V. ROSS

The celebration of New Year's day in New York has necessarily changed with the people who celebrate it. It was transplanted to New Amsterdam from Holland when a few houses clustered about the fort and every person in the village knew every other person. That was a fit community for making calls. When the people of New York had grown from hundreds to millions the custom broke down of its own weight.

How far back dates the custom of seeing the old year out and the new year in is not known. Certain it is that one night in New Amsterdam—Dec. 31—Hendrick, the watch, after calling the hour "Twelve o'clock and all's well," turned to walk to the next corner to repeat the announcement, when he saw the house of Killian van Gansback in a blaze of illumination from fully a dozen wax candles. Hammering with the great iron knocker, the upper half of the door was opened, and he saw a number of Dutch girls in many petticoats and young men in many pairs of breeches raising pewter mugs to drink in Holland gin to St. Nicholas, the patron saint of the town, "May he grant us a prosperous year!"

"What means this invasion of the night when all good citizens should be sound asleep in bed?" he cried. "Disperse!"

The moment it was noticed that the intruder upon the festivities was the watch every light was blown out and there was a scattering of the revelers. Bolts were shot, and in a few minutes the rooms on the ground floor were locked and the great front door was barred.

At that time Katrina Van Gansback was at a marriageable age, and her father had decided to wed her to old Dedrick Beekman, more than twice as old as she. Her mother was dead, and she had been brought up under the care of her aunt, Anneke Ten Eyck, a spinster of fifty. During the festivities on that eventful night the aunt drew Beekman into a side room for the purpose of arranging the settlement he was to make upon her niece and to appoint a day for the wedding.

Katrina was not only opposed to marrying old Beekman, but had a lover in young Wouter Ten Broeck, and the young couple were at their wits' end to find a way to defeat Anneke Ten Eyck's plan for marrying Katrina to Beekman. During the evening of the old-new year conviviality Katrina stood at the door listening to the arrangements that were being made to dispose of her. The moment the company were gone and the lights were put out she turned the key on her aunt and Beekman and led her father, who was feeble, up to his room and put him to bed.

A loud knocking came from below, but as the only persons in the house, except the couple locked in below, were Katrina and her father, and the latter was deaf as the stone steps in front of the house, their ability to get out depended solely on Katrina. When she had seen her father in bed and well covered, especially about the ears, she went out, closing the door behind her, and descended to the room where the prisoners were still hammering to be freed.

"Who's there?" asked the minx, pretending ignorance.

"Your Aunt Anneke. Let me out at once."

"Any one else?"

"Yes; Meinheer Beekman is in here with me."

"Oh, auntie, what a talk this will cause!"

"No scandal at all unless you blab."

"My keeping the secret will do no good. You and Meinheer Beekman must be married."

"Nonsense! There's no need of the matter getting out."

"I don't want to marry Meinheer Beekman, and I do want to marry Wouter Ten Broek."

There was no reply to this for some time. Evidently the parties within were consulting as to what it was best to do. Whether the woman refused to marry the man or the man refused to marry the woman was never known. At any rate, after a conference the aunt returned to the attack, or, rather, persuasion, telling her niece of the advantages she would enjoy as the wife of Meinheer Beekman, who was the largest dealer in pelts in New Amsterdam.

But Katrina was not to be persuaded, and her aunt was at last obliged to consent to her terms. No written pledge was required, for Katrina needed, only to tell the story to set the tongues of the town wagging about her aunt and Meinheer Beekman.

As soon as an agreement was reached Katrina unlocked the door, and Meinheer Beekman, taking down the bars to the front door, stole away in the darkness. The next day the betrothal of Katrina and Wouter Ten Broek was announced.

Katrina kept the secret till after her aunt had been dead some years, then told it to her daughter, who was about to be married. The daughter handed it down, and it is preserved in the archives of the family to this very day.

However, the story does not prove that the Dutchmen of New Amsterdam were in the habit of seeing the old year out and the new year in, else the watch would not have broken up the party.

The Children's Pleasure

How to amuse children is one of the problems which every mother must face. The little ones often become restless and want new amusement.

A delightful pastime is played with a small feather. The children are grouped together, and a mass of fluff is thrown into the air. It is the business of every player to blow the feather toward his or her neighbor, for if the mass of fluff should fall on or near an individual that person loses the game.

The children are not allowed to run away from the feather outside a definite line, which may be marked with chalk. Any one who is responsible for sending the fluffy stuff outside of bounds also goes out of the game.

An old fashioned game, which is none the less absorbing, is known as "rural spilikens." A number of straws or little straight sticks are gathered together, and these are stood up so that they all meet at the top and spread out like a tent at the bottom.

Two or three additional sticks are obtained, and on the end of these are placed crooked pins.

Each player takes a crook in turn and endeavors to remove a straw or stick without shaking or throwing down the others. Any culprit goes out of the game, and the winner is the child who has obtained the greatest number of sticks.

Another simple game which can be arranged anywhere is called "take care," played out of doors.

On a flat piece of ground a little pile of dry earth or sand or snow is made. Take a small stick and in a cleft at the top fit a square of white paper to represent a flag. Finally push the stick down the center of the mound.

Each player is given a stick, and the object of the game is to remove a little of the snow from the mound without upsetting the flag. The last stages of the game are exciting, seeing that a trifle will often upset the flag.

The player who is responsible for the failure goes out of the game, and the flag is set up once more. The player who holds out to the end is the winner.

Another delightful pastime for stormy days is Japanese water flowers, which may be bought for 5 cents a box at any oriental bazaar. Give the children a bowl of tepid water and let them drop the charming wads in. A flower blooms instantaneously. Convalescent children, who must be kept quiet and happy, adore these flowers.

Stone Tablet Gives Story of Early Days at Spearfish, S. D.

Pierre, S. D.—The state museum has received from W. E. Lyman of Spearfish a stone tablet found on the mountain above Spearfish by Louis Theor in March, 1887. It is a flat sandstone slab about ten inches square, upon which is scratched the following inscription:

"Came to these hills in 1833, seven of us, De La Compt, Ezra Kind, G. W. Wood, E. Brown, R. Kent, William King, Indian Crow. All dead but me Ezra Kind, killed by Ind beyond high hill, got our gold June, 1834. Got all of the gold we could carry on our pony, all got by the Indians. Oakland.—J. F. Yates of Corvallis, Ore., will receive $6,000 from the estate of the late Ernest W. Arnold of Benton county, Ore., provided that he throws four diamond rings belonging to Arnold's deceased mother into the Pacific one mile off Yaquina bay.

Arnold's will was filed for probate here recently. Yates, Arnold's friend, is named executor and must also erect a tombstone over the grave of Arnold's mother.

The will is dated May 17, 1915, and leaves some jewelry to a niece, Marie White of Ruston, La. The reasons for Arnold's strange bequest are unknown.

The Salad Bowl.

ASSORTED FRUIT SALAD.—Prepare finely cut celery with the shredded whites of hard boiled eggs. Mash the yolks to a smooth paste with skinned and boned sardines and shape the mixture into balls, dipping them at last into a little of the dry yolk so as to make them a rich yellow. Dress the celery and egg whites with French dressing or mayonnaise, put the mixture on a bed of lettuce.

Whole Tomato Salad.—Scald some large, fully ripe and yet firm tomatoes; remove skins and put them against the ice for several hours. Put a whole tomato on one or two lettuce leaves, dress with well chilled mayonnaise and serve in this individual manner. This salad is meat and drink in point of nutriment, and many persons find it quite enough for the substantial dish of a Sunday night tea.

Fish Salad.—A delicious salad which is yet something out of the regular course is made of Bismarck herrings, three of which would make a dish large enough for several persons. Put the herrings in a bowl and cover them with a dressing made of olive oil, cayenne, horseradish and sliced white onion; add a tablespoonful of sauce and one of walnut ketchup. After the fish has soaked some time in the dressing, arrange it in a bed of lettuce finely shredded with the fingers and pour over the sauce.

Pickled Mussel Salad.—Line a bowl with thin strips of hard toast, then put in a pile of pickled mussels, dressing with oil and vinegar in which some sliced onion has soaked for awhile. The mussels can be had bottled, and all the good fish stores keep the freshly prepared ones once the season for them arrives. Add enough of the pickle liquid to moisten the toast.

Cheese Salad.—Rub cottage cheese to a smooth paste with cream, butter and salt; make the mixture into balls. Then rub a salad bowl with a cut clove of garlic and fill it with chicory or endive cut into narrow strips; border the bowl with the cheese balls after the center part of the salad has been treated to a French dressing.

Almond Salad.—Stone and chop six fat pimento olives; add half a cupful of blanched almonds cut fine and the same quantity of finely cut celery. Serve on lettuce with mayonnaise made without mustard.

"Good morning," said an old lady briskly, entering a baker's shop. "Permit me to compliment you on the lightness of your bread."

The baker rubbed his hands and smiled benignly. "Thank you, madam," he said proudly, but respectfully. "It is my aim to bake the lightest bread in this city."

"And you do it," said the old lady. "If it gets much lighter it'll take two of your pound loaves to weigh sixteen ounces!"—London Mail.

Easy & Practical Home Dress Making Lessons

Prepared Especially For This Newspaper by Pictorial Review.

Suit of Green Broadcloth.

Green broadcloth is used to fashion this attractive tailored suit with box jacket and skirt of smart design.

Two or three colors are used principally for tailored suits for well-dressed women, and green is among the most fashionable. This suit is in green broadcloth trimmed with wide black silk braid. The box jacket has two styles of collars and may be trimmed with or without pockets.

In medium size the suit requires 4⅝ yards of 54 inch material, with 3¼ yards wide and 1 yard of narrow braid. The coat is a design that may be used separately, therefore a lesson on how to cut it is given for the benefit of the home dressmaker. All of the sections are cut from the material after it has been folded in half.

The back is laid on the lengthwise fold and this is the only piece of the pattern so arranged. Opposite the back, toward the selvage edge, is the upper sleeve, and to the right of this is the under-sleeve section. Going again near the fold, but resting on a lengthwise thread, are the collar and pocket. The front is placed to the right of the pocket and the underfacing along the selvage edge opposite.

If desired with the turn-down collar and the front rolled back, cut off the upper front edges of front and underfacing on double "oo" perforations.

Braid is the logical trimming for tailored suits and will be used to great extent on the suits designed for southern wear. After the unprecedented vogue for fur it would be impossible to leave the new coats untrimmed, so bands of braid are preferred to the folds of silk and satin which have the disadvantage of not wearing so well.

Gaberdine, which has been a trifle overworked, looms up in new guise this season and it's labeled broadcloth gaberdine. There's also a new whipcord gaberdine that promises to be popular. Illustrated.

ELECTRIC LIT FARMS BECOMING POPULAR

Kansas Instructor Looks For End of Old System.

Manhattan, Kan.—Use of electricity on the farm for the sake of convenience, safety or comfort is urged by G. G. McNair, instructor in electrical engineering in the Kansas State Agricultural college.

"Twelve years ago farm lighting plants were a novelty; today they are rapidly growing in popularity," says Mr. McNair.

"They are usually operated by a gasoline engine, but in the eastern states, and especially in the Appalachian mountains, it is not uncommon to see water power used for this purpose. Where the people have water power the storage battery is not used.

"In every state where farmers care at all for convenience one will find a number of lighting plants. Some farmers prefer the blaugas, acetylene or gasoline lighting systems, so that they may utilize the heat, but there is a certain element of danger in using these systems.

"Plants, including engine, generator, battery and switchboard, can be bought for $134 up. Such plants are of very small capacity, will operate only a few lights and must be charged every day."

CAN'T PROVE HE'S DEAD.

Will of a Man Missing Twenty-one Years Offered For Probate.

Denver.—For the first time in the history of the Denver county court the will of a man of whose death there is no record has been lodged with the clerk of the court. It may become necessary to have the maker, George T. Sheets, declared legally dead before the instrument is offered for probate.

Sheets, a contractor, made the will in 1893. He was then seventy-two years old. A year later he disappeared. The family did not know of the existence of the will until recently, when Attorney Edwin Parke discovered the document in his safe. Parke turned it over to the clerk of the court.

WED UNDER WRONG NAME.

McCurdey Repented; Ceremony Over Again.

Lamar, Mo.—An unusual marriage ceremony took place here recently when Mr. and Mrs. Roy McCurdey were married for the second time, though they never had been divorced.

Four years ago McCurdey came to this section and, for a lark, he says, assumed the name of Roy Roach. Under that name he courted and wedded Rosa Rector, a Lamar girl. A short time ago he admitted that his right name was McCurdey. The young woman's parents insisted that the marriage ceremony be pronounced again and that the right name be used.

HOW TO SMOCK.

Better to Practice on Dimity Before You Tackle a Silk Garment.

Crossbarred dimity is best to learn to smock on, as the lines are a great help in preparing the work. There should be about three spaces to an inch. The part to be smocked must first be gathered into tucks of even size with black thread. After some practice these spaces can be measured with the eye, but at first the crossbarred or dotted material is a big help and time saver. After gathering with strong black thread as many rows half an inch apart as will cover the space that is to be smocked the garment is ready for the actual smocking.

Mercerized floss in medium weight in double thread is the best cotton to use. The twisted cotton single is also effective for coarse work. This floss holds its color and comes in attractive shades. The stitches are made very much like the featherstitch and have the same number of variations. The featherstitch is done toward the sewer, whereas smocking is worked away from the sewer. Every time a new stitch is taken one picks up a tuck previously made by the black bastings. After some practice it will be easy to pick up just the right amount of material from each tuck, but everything depends upon the evenness of the spacing in the beginning. The different stitches are made by changing the thread from one side of the needle to the other, just as in featherstitching. The combination of stitches with themselves and with each other ... less that no two ... be alike, and the ... and materials makes ... fascinating.

It is ... smocked ... drap...

The Bridge Luncheon

The best filling for luncheon sandwiches is chopped chicken moistened with cream salad dressing; chopped ham and a little sour pickle moistened with dressing is also good. These two seem to be the most popular. A hot drink at this time of the year is better than punch and less expensive—either coffee or cocoa. The little drop cakes are easy to serve and always popular.

In making sandwiches use fine grained bread twenty-four hours old. It makes the best sandwiches. Cut in thin, even slices, removing crusts. Soften butter before spreading. Cut sandwiches in small, fancy shapes as desired, such as fingers. There are about four from a sandwich and are easy to eat. Wrap in dampened napkins until served. Here are recipes for some sandwiches; each recipe is enough to serve twenty-five persons:

Midnight.—Two loaves white sandwich bread, one-half pound butter and two heads lettuce.

Filling.—Mix together one and one-half cupfuls minced cooked chicken, three-quarters cupful finely chopped celery, one-half cupful ground boiled ham, one and one-half cupfuls mayonnaise or a boiled cream dressing if preferred. Lay lettuce leaf on thinly buttered slice of bread, spread liberally with mixture, cover with lettuce leaf and second slice of bread.

Assez Moutarde.—Two loaves white sandwich bread, a pound butter.

Filling.—A cupful mayonnaise or cooked dressing highly seasoned with mustard mixed with two cupfuls ground lean ham and two-thirds cupful chopped nuts.

Spanish.—Four loaves entire wheat bread, a pound butter.

Filling.—A cupful mayonnaise, two cupfuls chopped olives, a dozen chopped pimentoes.

Perfection.—Four loaves entire wheat or white bread, one pound butter.

Filling.—Two-thirds cupful stuffed olives, two-thirds cupful tender celery, two-thirds cupful pecans. Chop fine, mix and moisten with mayonnaise.

For the little cakes try these; there will be enough for twenty-five persons:

Peanut Patties.—Cream one-fourth cupful butter and one-half cupful of sugar; add two eggs well beaten. Mix and sift one cupful of flour, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and one teaspoonful salt and add to creamed mixture. Then add one-fourth cupful milk, one cupful finely chopped peanuts and two teaspoonfuls of lemon juice. Drop in small spoonfuls on greased baking sheets, one to two inches apart, and place half a peanut on each. Bake in a slow oven to a delicate brown.

Deliciose.—Mix together one-third cupful of soft butter, one-half cupful brown sugar, one-half cupful granulated sugar, a few grains of salt, one egg (beaten), two squares of melted chocolate, one-half cupful flour, three-quarters cupful of pecan or walnut meats cut fine and one teaspoonful vanilla. Spread mixture evenly in pans lined with paraffin paper and bake in a slow oven. When done, remove at once from pan and cut in strips or squares.

No doubt you know how to decorate your table. Just now the pretty holiday greens can be used to great advantage. Where there are so many to serve you are no doubt planning to pass the refreshments. Small tables are nice, as four can sit and have a place for the cups and saucers and a small plate. These do not take up much room and can be placed in two or more rooms as for a card party. Each table may be prettily decorated.

Why Do Dairy Cows Run Down?

No other farm animal is the cause of so much anxiety to the owner as his dairy cows; sickness gets in in spite of the best of care.

KOW-KURE

Why? Because the dairy cow is subjected to constant forcing to get the maximum in quantity and quality of the milk yield. This constant strain proves too much for many a good cow; some important function becomes impaired and for want of proper medical assistance she becomes a "backward" cow. In just such cases as these Kow-Kure has made its reputation for success when used to

of the herd. Kow-Kure is a medicine for cows only—not a stock food. It has wonderful medicinal qualities that act on the organs of production and reproduction for the prevention or cure of many serious cow ailments. It is especially useful in cases of Abortion, Barrenness, Milk Fever, Scouring, Lost Appetite, Bunches, Retained Afterbirth, etc. Farmers who have used it keep Kow-Kure on hand constantly. Most feed dealers and druggists sell it.

"Wornout" New York Realized 32 Per Cent on Orignal Investment

An example of what intelligent farm management may accomplish on a so-called "wornout" New York hill farm, according to the Federal Department of Agriculture, is offered in the case of a place surveyed in Broome County, which wasb ought for $16.32 per acre, and in two years was made to pay over 32 per cent. on the investment.

This place wasb ought by a farmer who was already farming at a profit in thev alley below. It consisted of 95 acres og gently rolling land. The land had ben cropped with hay and buckwheat for years, and little or no manure or other fertilizing material had been applied. Consequently the soil was in very poor physical condition. There was a good frame house on thef arm, and a rather poor barn.

A tenant was engaged to live in the house and do the work on the farm under theo wner's direction. Under the terms of the agreement the owner furnished all thel ime and clover seed and half of the other seeds and of the fertilizer. He also supplied a potato planter and digger. The tenant furnished the rest of them achinery, his own teams, and all of the labor. In return he was to receive one-half of the oats, buckwheat and potatoes raised, and the income from four cows which he was permitted to keep. It wae provided, however, that he was to feed all the hay and roughage on the farm and to return the manure, straw, etc., to the land. He was also to do all the improvement work for which he had time, such as picking up stones and cutting hedgerows.

The new owner took possession on April 1. The cropping system adopted for the first season was necessarily a makeshift, owing to a lack of time for putting a definite plan for improvement into execution.

Four acres of potatoes were planted. The seed happened to be poor, and only 400 pounds of commercial fertilizer being used, the yield was only 90 bushels per acre. Five acres of buckwheat yielded 116 bushels. Lime and acid phosphate were applied to one eight-acre tract, and from this field 300 bushels of oats were harvested. At the same time an excellent stand of clover was obtained in the same field. Ten head of young cattle were pastured on a slope where the land was rough and not available for tillage. An old meadow was mowed, yielding about a ton of rather poor hay per acre.

During the summer permanent repairs were made at a cost of about $400. At the end of the year the owner's gross receipts amounted to $2[illegible]0.30, of which $157.50 represented his income from his investment.

The next year about nine acres of sod land were plowed and put into potatoes. The tenant left some of the seed potatoes exposed for several days and as a result a very uneven stand was secured. Three plantings were made. The first, from freshly cut seed, gave an even stand, and yielded 150 bushels to the acre. The next and largest planting made a very poor stand, yielding only 50 bushels to the acre, while the last was good and yielded 150 bushels to the acre. From the whole field 816 bushels were dug, an average of about 90 bushels per acre. These were worth $1 a bushel at the farm, however, which in part made up for the low yield.

However, even if the owner were allowed $500 for his superintendence and $20 for the use of the few tools which hec ontributed, the investment would still show a dividend of 9 per cent. At the same time the tenant made a comfortable living. No strict record was kept of his returns, but his share of the field crops for the second year was worth about $500, while the four cows contributed materially to the family living.

MINETTO MAY USE LAKE WATER IN THE MAINS

The Palladium, in Friday's issue. is authority for thef ollowing news:

One of the first things that will be done after the new town of Minetto is organized will be the formation of a new water company to supply Minetto and surrounding territory, according to an announcementm ade in Minetto today.

Parties identified with the Columbia Mills, Inc., have already taken steps to organize such a concern and will, shortly after the new Town Board is inducted into office, apply for a franchise which will permit them to lay mains in the town.

As soon as the franchise is secured the company will start negotiations with the city of Oswego to secure a supply of water from Lake Ontario on a olngterm lease. They will ask that this water be supplied to them at the city line on the West river road, from which point they will pipe it into Minetto. At the present time Minetto has no water supply and with the growth of tha settlemen there is a big demand for modern conveniences.

The new company will not be organized as a revenue producer, but will aim to furnish the water to the residents of Minetto at a price that will simply protect them on their proposed lease with the city and the interest on their investment.

There is already talk there as to the new officers. A. G. Forbes, one of the well known residents of the North end of the the town, announced his candidacy for collector and he is going to get out a petition and go to the electors seeking support. William H. Young, formerly of this city and now a resident of Minetto, where re conducts a garage, is mentioned for highway superintendent.

Thomas McCann, who was elected in November as the Supervisor of the town of Oswego, will serve out his two wears' term as the first Supervisor of the town of Minetto. After today the official division of the town takes place.

Mr. Callison said yesterday that he would not be a candidate for Supervisor of Oswego town. It was said today that the new Town Board would name W. W. Rounds for the position. The latter is still confined to his home with a severe attack of grip, but it was said by neighbors who were in the city that he is much better and that in a few days he hopes to be about again as usual.

BROOKLINE RECENTS

Brookline, that oasis of exclusiveness, surrounded by the more prosaic area of metropolitan Boston, has taken a revolutionary step. It has abolished its town meeting system, which has existed for 210 years. The Knickerbocker Press believes that this will be discomforting news for those friends of mankind who have long contended that pure democracy could not be found outside of a New England town meeting.

Brookline, indeed, has been something of a town. In March, 1706, when it had its first town meeting, the population was about 250 and there were sixty voters. Now there is a population of more than 32,000, and the town has a valuation of $125,000,000. In the homogeneity, the population has been, in recent times, nearly as congruous as in that distant past from which it is now severing itself. The interests of most of its residents have continued to be practically identical. If direct government would work anywhere with a large mass of population, it would seem that Brookline should have found the system practicable.—Knickerbocker Press.

British Labor Leader Says "Flag is Nothing" Conditions the Factor

London—"I am irrevocably opposed to any form of compulsory military service. I have never wavered in this view and do not propose to do so now, 'een though we are in the middle of our greatest war.

"I am proud to belong to a free State. My interest is not in the soil or situation of thec ountry, but in its free traditions, laws, and the measure of freedom which is allowed. If we are called upon to forgo these, my interest departs.

"To labor a flag is nothing. It is conditions of life which are the determining factor.

"Despite labor's efforts and in the face of the magnificent response of the people to call for recruits, the country finds itself threatened by the Government with a measure for conscription. In view of the facts of the recruiting it is difficult to believe that military necessities dictate this policy.

The Government has constantly refused to announce any figures concerning the recruiting. It is alleged that to do so would be to give valuable information to the enemies.

Nobody outside of the Government doubts the enemy's possession of all the essential facts concerning the size of the army, and probably nobody outside of the War Office feels there is any danger to the country in the enemy possessing this knowledge.

It is not so much knowledge of the size of armies as knowledge of their quality which is dangerous. But to have given figures would have been to smash forever any idea of conscription.

The Government has allowed itself to be overborne by those who desire compulsory service, not for military purposes, but in order that they may control, and where necessary destroy, the efforts for industrial, social and political advancement.

In order to secure some sort of support for the conscriptionist programme the Government has resorted to the miserable expedient of pitting married men against single.

It makes a profound mistake if it imagines that the married workmen of this country are so unintelligent as to miss the real purport of the effort to divide them from their fellow workers.

When the question of single versus married men was raised, everybody understood it meant that all the single men who volunteered would be called up before the married men under the group system. It was never in the minds of labor that all the single men in the country would be compelled to serve before any married volunteers were called upon.

It is doubtful whether there are 600,000 unattested single men between the ages of ninteen and forty-one in the country. There is every justification for assuming that at least 60 per cent of these are medically unfit. Many of them were rejected before the National Registration act came into force.

Of the remainder 20 per cent are engaged in essential occupations, and to remove them would be to further dislocate industry and damage national credit.

Among the residue will be found Quakers and others whose religious convictions, not lack of courage or interest, keep them out of the conflict.

The balance of actual shirkers is indeed a negligible quantity, and it will be a confession of ineptitude if the Government decides

ROCHESTER MAN THOUGHT ABOUT AS CHAIRMAN OF G. O. P. STATE COMMITTEE

An Albany dispatch of the New York Sun says that the name of George W. Aldridge, of Rochester, seems to be chief among the names that are mentioned for the Republican state chairmanship. The present chairman, Frederick C. Tanner, is said to be not anxious to serve again.

Among the first activities of the committee, when it meets soon, will be the selection of candidates for four delegates-at-large to the national convention, to be chosen at the April Primaries, when the members of a new State Committee also will be elected. The new committee will elect the state chairman.

It is said that Tanner can have the place again if he desires it, but it is intimated also that there are obstacles in his way. He himself has told his friends, is said, that he is more willng to serve his party in the presidential campaign than to serve another term as state chairman. Some of the friends of Governor Whitman, according to the Sun's correspondent, seem to be of the opinion that Tanner's alignment on some of the questions that came before the Constitutional Convention did not show "a continued interest in the Governor's political future.

Chairman Tanner was picked by Governor Whitman to conduct his gubernatorial campaign two year sago. Mr. Aldridge is said to be one of the Governor's strongest supporters now.

"The selection of Mr. Aldridge as chairman," says the Sun's correspondent, "would be acceptable to all shades of Republican opinion in the state, but there has been no suggestion from him that he owuld accept."

Lungmotor Wanted; Public-Spirited Men May Make Purchase

Following a demonstration which will be given to a gathering of city physicians at the office of the Fulton, Heat, Light & Power Company sometime during the present week, of the new lungmotor received from the Life-Saving Devices Company, of Chicago, Ill., an effort will be made by John J. Jordan, manager of the Lighting company to interest officials of the city and manufacturers in maintaining for emergency purposes one of thel ife saving outfits in the City Hall.

The new instrument, which is operated by hand in the manner of a pump, is principally used in the hospitals, gas plants, factories where gaseous fumes are apt to endanger the lives of employes. As a rule a like apparatus is kept by the various municipalities. Especially useful is the apparatus in the event of an electric shock.

That from time to time there are accidents in the City of Fulton which by some adequate artificial means can be prevented from proving fatal is admitted, and, according to Mr. Jordan within the past year or two there have been several cases within his recollection where a life could have been saved, passibly, had an artificial means of respiration been applied.

The outfit is not costly and considering the possibility that only one life may be saved thereby, it would well warrant the expenditure. There are factories in Fulton where employes are in danger of asphyxiation from poisonous gases. In the sulphite mills men are exposed to danger; asphyxiation by smoke in a fire is a danger that besets the members of the Fire Department; linemen coming in contact with heavily charged overhead wires; and laborers working in trenches where even sewer gas accumulating will jeopardize their lives, are only a few of the instances cited where the reasonableness of having an emergency respirator is evident.

The apparatus is composed of a number of units, none of complex nature but that a city employe could operate the outfit satisfactorily.

City Attorney to Make Report on Financial Standing, is Ordered

The first meeting of the Board of Public Works under Mayor Lewis's administration, was held last night. The following officials were present including the members of theb oard: Mayor V. C. Lewis, William S. Hillick, city attorney; A. W. Wiltsie, P. J. O'Brien and H. P. Allen, commissioners; C. M. Allen, jr., city clerk; Frank Rumsey, superintendent of public works, and G. Clayton Hill, city engineer.

The discussion bore mostly upon the finances of the various city departments. At the conclusion of the meeting the city attorney was requested by Mayor Lewis to investigate and report on the exact status of the overdrawn city department funds.

Attorney Hillick has stated that the new administration aims to follow out its pre-elecion promises to citizens to the letter and that to do this the exact standing of city affairs must be made known.

Another matter left to the city attorney to act upon, under the direction of the mayor is the application of J. J. McGinnis, whose hotel building at Hannibal and 1st sts. burned recently to rebuild on the site. A handsome brick structure of three stories is contemplated, to be used as a garage, hotel and store. Mr. McGinnis states in his application that thhe plans call for the construction of the building to the street line.

The payment of some of the debts contracted by the outgoing administration may be held up on account of the orders given by the mayor to the city attorney to report the exact standing of all accounts before active work of the present encumbents begins.

The new common council will convene tonight at the City Hall for the first time.

A REAL MEAT REFORM

For ten years there has been agitation over the rising cost of meat, and public hope has been centered on a vague something that might be done to packers and middlemen. Meanwhile there has been going on a silent movement which if it does not actually reduce meat prices, will certainly keep them from rising, as they must in future without its influence.

It is a farmers' movement — the steady increase in acreage of alfalfa. During thep ast four years, 2,000,000 acres have been added, and the total is now 6,500,000 acres. Kansas alone has nearly 1,200,000 acres, Nebraska is in the 1,000,000acre class, Colorado has 900,000 acres. Fifteen states have more than 100,000 acres each; even Florida and Rhode Island are represented with seventy-five acres apiece.

A well-known corn expert predicts that two billion bushels of corn, instead of three billions, will soon answer the country's needs, because more and more meat is being made with alfalfa and finished off with corn, where once only corn was fed.

The great increase in alfalfa is bringing low prices for the hay in some of the Western States where livestock has not kept pace with the acreage. In California, Colorado, Idaho and Wyoming, where the value is set at five and a half to eight dollars a ton, against an average of ten dollars a ton in other Western States, it is clerly seen that the hay must be fed to livestock. In some cases it will be beef cattle and hogs for meat. In other cases the best profit can be secured by dairying.

The alfalfa factor in our meat supply will probably have two broad results: In the first place, it should give a more even distribution of meat, because animals will be raised, fed and slaughtered in every state where this great forage crop thrives, instead of coming from a few range states. In the second place alfalfa will greatly increase our output of dairy products, and when our per-capita consumption of milk and cheese has increased the pressure on our meat supply will be somewhat relieved.—Country Gentleman.

A WOMAN'S FAVORITE among animals is a horse, and no wonder, for with one she can have a great deal of pleasure. All of our horses are so gentle and well-broken that the most timid woman need have no fear in driving them. Why not take a drive these fine afternoons, and enjoy yourself?

WE THANK YOU!

It was yesterday that a citizen of Fulton, one of foreign birth, came for the second time up the "beaten path" to the office of the Evening Times. His first mission was to ask the publication of a bit of information which would aid the suffering brothers' in his old home land. The request was promptly and gladly met, and the incident was thought closed. Yesterday, as the beginning of our story says, the second trip was made up the "beaten path" and in broken English the voice said, "You have helped us and I pay you now." The explanation given was that no charge had been made. Surprise gleamed from the eyes for a moment, but as the purse was returned to the pocket the voice quietly and simply said, "We thank you for your kindness."—just that, and one of poor, torn little Poland's friends had passed into the street. "We thank you for your kindness!"—bless us, if the roar of a howitzer could be any more startling, we doubt it. Do we, as American citizens, go about our business with our headpiece adorned with silver dollars? Are we expected to dispense kindness as a sort of by-product when a dollar looms in sight, or worse yet, let kindness be an accident?

Friend of Poland, resident of the West Side. We thank you for your kindness. We bid you God-speed in the dawn of a glorious day for your troubled little home-land o'er the seas. Through "the harsh noises of the day" the simple thanks for kindness sounds a clear bell-like note. May Fulton ever leave the latch string out to Poland.

HENRY FORD DESERVES RESPECT, NOT RIDICULE

Henry Ford is home again. Very quietly he came into New York on New Year's Day, and very quietly slipped away to Detroit. Mr. Ford came home sick in body. Whether he came home sick at heart we do not know. Certainly, he has had trials enough to shake the stoutest heart.

He has been caricatured, lampooned, ridiculed and vituperated. The good-natured have made him the butt of countless jests. The ill-natured have rancorously held him up to scorn as a vulgar charlatan, seeking free advertising.

Meantime, the men and women whom he mistook for great souls and who were, for the most part, notoriety-hunting freaks and mountebanks or simply cheap parasites, glad of a free trip anywhere, repaid Mr. Ford's hospitality and generosity by making the expedition a grotesque and ridiculous farce.

Henry Ford did not get the boys out of the trenches by Christmas. He did not move very judiciously to accomplish that result or any concrete beneficial result.

Having said this much—which is all that can be fairly said in criticism—let us do justice to Henry Ford's motives and deeds.

Henry Ford was not alone in longing for peace. Millions of his countrymen and countrywomen share that longing. There is but one difference between Henry Ford and the rest of us.

Henry Ford DID SOMETHING to bring about peace.

No matter if he failed, he at least TRIED. Had every citizen of the United States, including the President and his Cabinet and the members of Congress, put forth one-tenth the individual effort that Henry Ford put forth, THE BOYS WOULD HAVE BEEN OUT OF THE TRENCHES BY CHRISTMAS.

The first to criticize men who do things are those who never do anything themselves.

Every man whom akes an honest effort in a righteous cause performs a good and brave deed and deserves the commendation of all right-thinking persons. Nor can any one say certainly that such an effort is a failure, no matter how ridiculous it may seem at the moment.

John Brown's expedition was ridiculous enough, hopeless enough, impossible enough. Yet when the ridiculous expedition had failed and the stern old Abolitionist had died on the scaffold and his cause seemed lost in shame and scorn, there sprang, at that very instant, from the ashes of his defeat the strong Angel of Deliverance to lead the slaves to freedom and the Union to its nobler future.

Henry Ford does not deserve the ridicule of the wise and good. He deserves their respect, their approval, their applause. His mission is indeed an apparent failure. Yet none can say how much good may come from this apparent failure.

The historian of the future, looking back through clearer perspective upon these times through which we all grope in clouds and thick darkness, may possibly write down Henry Ford's mission as the beginning of great popular movements which finally brought permanent peace to the whole world.

We do not know that this will be so. But we do know that no fine and unselfish human effort is ever wholly wasted. Mr. Ford has done his best in a good and useful cause. His purpose was unselfish, and the end he proposed to achieve was a noble and splendid end. Let him take heart of courage from the brave and true words of another unselfish and high-souled American—the good Quaker poet Whittier:

"Knowing this, that never yet
Share of truth was vainly set
In the world's wide fallow;
After hands shall sow the seed,
After hands from hill and mead,
Reap the harvest yellow."

That is the true philosophy of life, of whole effort, of moral victory which lifts the unselfish soul above temporary defeats and in its highest manifestation laughs even death to scorn and exults above the grave.—N. Y. American.

Our Washington Letter

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE

In casting about to find provender for a hungry horde of "deserving Democrats" Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo sees an opportunity to make more room at the public crib by enlarging the force of income-tax collectors. In support of his request to Congress that their number be augmented, he says, in his annual report, recently made public.

"For the fiscal year 1915 there was a total of 295,723 personal and corporation income-tax returns to be examined, and with the present force of 274, field officers, making examinations at the same average as experience has shown that they are able to go, it will require three and a half years for this force to complete the examination of the transcripts that will be sent to the agents for examination in the present fiscal year."

Mathematically reduced to its simplest form that statement means that the number of returns for each examiner averages 1080. Allowing 300 working days to a year, the examiner will have not less than 1050 days to complete his share of the work. His reckoning to the Government, therefore, for the comfortable salary he draws, is represented by thel abor required to examine one return a day, which means inefficiency of a positively wicked sort, and quite characteristic of the Democratic party.

When the income-tax collection, provided for by the Democratic law, was put into operation an opening was made for the appointment of a great many employees. Thec hief qualification was that they be Democrats. The appointments were at first of a temporary character, but very soon they began to be covered into the United States civil service by the hundreds, on the executive order of President Wilson, despite the vigorous protest of the National Civil Service Reform League and of everyone interested in preserving the integrity of our civil service. Up to the time of his election President Wilson was vice-president of that League, and he wrote to it as follows: "I am a hearty believer in the principles of civil-service reform and shall take pleasure at all times in doing what I can to promote those principles in practice." By executive orders he has thoroughly debauched it. His recent statement that the Republicans will have no issue but the tariff will require amending.

FREE GOODS—LESS REVENUE

Imports to the value of $38,057,733 entered the 13 principal customs districts of the United States for the week ending December 11, 1915. On these imports the Government realized a measly revenue of $4,039,706, or an average duty rate of 10.5 per cent., compared with an average duty rate under the Republican law of between 19 and 22 per cent. About 70 per cent of our imports are now coming inf ree of duty which, according to the Democratic theory, should decrease the cost of living. Nevertheless, the index numbers recently compiled by Bradstreet show a steady rise in the cost of living, proof that the tariff has nothing to do with the matter. Our imports today have reached in volume the Democratic low duty normal, and the Treasury deficit has reached characteristic Democratic proportions. The only beneficiaries of the Democratic tariff law have been the importers who bring in articles free of duty to compete with domestic production in the American market. If the Republican duty rates were in forces there would be no necessity for the extension of the war revenue measure. Yet, in addition to that extension, the order has gone forth to raise still more revenue by means of direct taxes.

SCHOOLHOUSES AS CENTERS

Seats of Education For Both Adults and Children.

COMMUNITY MEETING PLACES

There Is a Pronounced and Growing Sentiment to Extend the Uses of Public Schools and Make Them More Valuable to the Public at Large.

Until very recently millions of dollars were tied up in public school property, paid for in large part by the people of small means and utilized for only from five to seven hours a day in the week and nine months in the year, a total of not more than 1,400 hours a year, and closed through the remaining 8,760 hours of the year.

The public school funds, again a levy upon the small householder, were used solely for the regular school work, meaning for the most part the elementary education of young children. Every effort to open the schools for night classes or for any other purpose than that of the set routine of the prescribed school period met with vigorous opposition. Attempts to make a better utilization of the school plants were regarded as almost sacrilegious.

Pupils were turned out when they had finished the sixth grade or the grammar school or the fortunate few when they had graduated from the high school, and the public schools had no further concern with them. In the last decade, however, there has been a pronounced and growing sentiment in favor of getting better value for a larger part of the population out of the expensive American public school system.

All over the country there has come, slowly, but surely, the new order which makes the schoolhouses seats of education, not only for a very few pupils during a short period but for persons of all ages who wish to learn many things which are not set down in the ordinary public school curriculum. Also in most cities and large towns the schoolhouses are used for civic and social purposes, for immigrant classes and instruction in casting the ballot, for concerts, lectures and dances and for parent-teacher associations.

To show how widely this movement has extended, where the greatest advantage accrued and where the most remained to be done a survey was made by C. A. Perry of the Russell Sage foundation and published by the United States bureau of education.

Mr. Perry calls attention to the fact that it is a common habit to think of the activities that go on in the classroom as in some essential way different from those which go on in the parlor, the office or the shop. Because of the imposing and intricate machinery of modern education one loses sight of the fact that nothing is done in school that is not done outside. Boys and girls pick up a knowledge of letters and local geography before they go to school. With every one learning begins before school days and continues afterward.

The distinctive work of the schoolroom is to make certain common activities go better than they ordinarily do apart from it. Its efficacy was first appreciated by the church. As democracy developed and the participation of the people in the affairs of government increased concern was felt as to the wisdom and intelligence which the masses would display in the exercise of suffrage. The instruction given in the homes and by the church and private agencies was not sufficient to insure the adequate education of the citizens. The lack of uniformity in education was especially bad, and the public schools were instituted to better conditions.

The statistics that Mr. Perry collected in various parts of the country show that new and varied activities have come within the environment and under the control of public education. Mr. Perry thus translates their significance: "Do they show that lectures are held in schools? It means that new canals have been dug to facilitate commerce in the world's stores of knowledge. Do they reveal parent-teacher gatherings in classrooms? Society is getting team work between the home and the school. Political rallies and voting? The seat of democracy is being transferred from the back hall and the barber shop to more suitable quarters. The games of boys and girls? Childhood is beginning to receive intelligent consideration. Youths and maidens consorting in school halls and gymnasiums? Instincts of racial importance are being cherished instead of exploited. The figures roughly profile a ground swell of social effort."

New Model City.

The economic value of decent living and of Sunday observance is getting a thorough test on a great publicity work at Wissota, Wis., where the Wisconsin-Minnesota Light and Power company is constructing a $2,000,000 dam in the building of a model city by the company, giving homes to 1,000 persons.

The company will provide amusements, such as educational movie picture theaters, establish a hospital and make the city sanitary in every particular.

Among the first rules laid down by the company is that there shall be no desecration of the Sabbath, that gambling shall be barred and that no intoxicants shall be tolerated.

STRIFE IN THE CABINET.

Washington Had Troubles of His Own in His Official Family.

To represent the factions fairly, Washington chose for his cabinet four men who could not have differed more in character had he summoned them from the ends of the earth.

For secretary of state he chose Jefferson, the ardent theorist who had done his country the service of formulating the Declaration of Independence and was perhaps better known abroad than any American save the aged Franklin. For secretary of the treasury he called to him the phenomenal Hamilton, with the frame of a lad and the intellect of a giant, to whom it was given to perform miracles with an empty exchequer. The secretary of war was General Knox, large and showy, but, despite his pompous speech and grandly flourishing cane, a man of experience not only in battle, but in administering this same office under the Continental congress. The attorney general was Edmund Randolph, who proved of weaker moral fiber than the others.

Jefferson was the strong opposing personality of the administration. He had little patience with General Knox, whom he called "a man of parade," and he and Hamilton quarreled almost daily upon every conceivable topic, for Hamilton, Federalist to the core by instinct and conviction, became as inevitably spokesman for the party in power.

Even Washington could not preserve harmony in such a cabinet, and before the end of his first term both Hamilton and Jefferson resigned. Afterward the president had still greater difficulty with his council. His critics taunted him with being able to get only second rate men to fill their places, and Vice President Adams asserted that it was this, not high devotion to principle, that caused him to refuse a third term. But Adams was neither generous nor always just in his estimate of others.—Helen Nicolay in Century Magazine.

Sound Waves.

A sound wave consists of an alternate compression and refraction of the air. A singular result of this was noted after a great powder explosion at Erith, England, in 1864. The leaded glass windows of a church several miles away were all strongly bent inward on all sides of the church. The explanation was given in these words: "The sound wave on reaching the church separated right and left, and for a moment the edifice was clasped by a girdle of intensely compressed air, which forced all its windows inward." The subsequent dilation of the air was insufficient to force the bent panes back into shape.

BACK HOME AFTER 36 YEARS; THOUGHT DEAD

Returns In a Feeble and Needy Condition.

Pittsfield, Mass.—After wandering for thirty-six years all over the country George Churchill has returned to this city. In this interval of years all of his relatives have died except an aged sister, Mrs. George Murdock.

Churchill, after leaving Pittsfield, never communicated with his relatives. They believed him dead. In 1881 Mrs. Murdock read in the newspapers of the death of George Churchill in Ohio. His body had been buried, and the family here believed that the missing George Churchill of Pittsfield was the person who had died.

Recently a gray haired, bearded stranger revealed himself to the old family physician of the Churchills as the long absent George Churchill. From the physician he learned his sister was still living and was eighty-one years old, but in feeble health.

The physician prepared the sister for a meeting with the brother she had so long believed to be dead. Churchill, now aged sixty-nine, and his elder sister, so worn with age that she is being cared for, were brought together again. Mrs. Murdock was greatly shocked by the reappearance of her brother.

Churchill's story is one of wanderlust. He was a woodworker when he went away, and he followed his trade for years. New processes of labor saving machinery forced him to abandon his trade. He turned his hand to cooking, and for a long time worked in hotels and restaurants.

"All the years," he said, "I have been wanting to come back to see the folks. I couldn't get started. Now I'm old and worn out and there seemed to be no other place for me to go."

Churchill's health is broken, and he can no longer work. He will be provided for by friends of the Churchill family.

DOG CATCHES OYSTERS.

Owner Makes Good Profit From Industry of His Pet.

Milton, Del. — John Wilkins, who lives near Broadkiln Neck, has a dog that digs several bushels of oysters or clams in a day. The dog, a Scotch collie, wades into the water along the natural oyster beds at the mouth of Broadkiln creek and pulls off the oysters in clusters.

Wilkins declares she brings out from one to three bushels of oysters a day, at a net profit of $3 to him.

Bagged Fifty-two Pound Wolf.

Balaton, Minn.—Two boys, Evold Bylander and John Bollman, bagged a fifty-two pound wolf recently in rather a novel way. They were out hunting, one boy on a motorcycle and the other with a gun in the side car, when they spied the wolf and gave chase. After a wild ride of several miles they made a successful long shot.

Pirot Famous For Carpets.

Pirot is the center of an important Servian industry. Pirot carpets, blue and red, are to be found in every Servian home and have gained fame beyond the Balkans. They nearly all are made in private houses, entirely by hand, often without even a shuttle, the workers using no patterns, but artistic instinct producing harmonious results. The art has been acquired no doubt from the Turks, who learned it from the Persians, but Pirot carpets have qualities of their own. Colors and materials are so strong that it is almost impossible to wear them out.—London Chronicle.

Ultra Practical.

"I notice," said a husband who was reading a lengthy letter which his wife had written and had handed to him for perusal, "that you have made a stupid mistake. You have written 'mirage' instead of 'marriage.'"

"Either will do," replied the lady. "They both signify an illusion."

MARRYING SQUIRES BUSY.

So Busy They Want to Put an End to "Runners" in Jeffersonville, Ind.

Jeffersonville, Ind.—Some of the six justices of the peace of Jeffersonville who fight among themselves for "marriage couples," are proposing a combination whereby all six would establish central marrying parlors and would pool and divide equally all their earnings.

The chief benefit would be the elimination of the "runners," with whom the justices of the peace now split their fees, which only in exceptional cases amount to more than $3. One result of the competition has been the cutting of fees. Many eloping couples get married for $1 and some for "six bits." Secret weddings generally cost the elopers a little more, and a twenty-five dollar fee shows up once in awhile.

TOMBSTONES AS GUIDES.

Some Changes Are Made as a Result of Ore Boom in Nevada.

Reno, Nev.—Tombstones are being used for location monuments in the new mining district near Sodaville, where a supposed fabulously rich ledge of tungsten ore was discovered, according to reports brought to Reno by men who answer the call of the desert and mark the boundaries of their claim.

One miner located the village cemetery, and as there were no rocks near he used some of the best looking tombstones to mark the boundaries of his claim.

Others soon followed suit, and now the relatives of the departed, interred three years ago, would have a hard time recognizing one grave from another.

A Point to Consider.

"Dad," said the prodigal son, "now that I'm home again and have had my fling, I'm going to do something to make you proud of me."

"All right, son," answered the cautious father. "That's the way for you to talk, but I will reserve my congratulations until you make one point clear."

"Well, dad?"

"How much is this new venture of yours going to cost me?"—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Hard Luck.

"Jaggs certainly has the luck of getting up against it."

"Yes, we had our front door painted freshly the other day, and he got up against that too."—Baltimore American.

OPERATED ON 131 TIMES.

Patient In St. Louis Hospital Is Still Cheery at All Times.

St. Louis.—Harry Smyth, forty-two years old, of 3656 Laclede avenue, is one of the most cheerful patients at the City hospital despite the fact that 131 surgical operations have been performed on him. Tuberculosis of the bones have made these operations necessary. Since childhood Smyth has passed most of his time in hospitals.

To occupy his time Smyth took up sewing and crocheting, and he is now an expert with the needle. He is always good natured.

Where They Differed.

After suffering a long time with toothache the young colored girl got up her courage enough to go to the dentist. The moment he touched the tooth she began to scream.

"Look here," he said, "you mustn't yell like that. Don't you know I'm a 'painless dentist'?"

"Well, mebbe yo' is painless, sah," she said, "but Ah ain't."

A Different Way.

"Miss Flighty made all her money in letters."

"She doesn't look literary."

"She isn't. She won a breach of promise suit with 'em."—Baltimore American.

CRITICISES HENRY FORD'S PEACE EXPEDITION

In a recent address before Colgate University students, Congressman S. D. Fess, of Ohio, said: "I believe Americans have a perfect right to go on the sea, but I wish they would not exercise that right, for if too many of them go down, complications will arise which might drive us into this present turmoil.

"I ignored Mr. Henry Ford's request to go on the peace ship, not because I thought that Americans should not take to the sea, but because I thought that if any movements for peace were made, they should be proposed by one of the warring powers and acted on by the suitable authority—the President of the United States."

RESULTS OF ENGLISH TESTS IN SIX GRADES OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS

J. R. Fairgrieve, superintendent of the public schools, makes public the result of the recent English test in the six grades. Prefacing the report is a statement by the superintendent who requests the teachers to make it a point to go over the papers with the pupils and show them where the errors occur. Prof. Fairgrieve admits mistakes may have occurred in some instances in marking the papers, but he insists upon the advisability of following up the work of each pupil and correctin the mistakes as the best way to secure good results.

Calls for High Standards

The points of excellence called for in the tests are penmanship, neatness and orderly arrangement of work and reference is made in these respects to the standard set by the strongest teachers of the country whog ive constant attention to their work.

Continuing Prof. Fairgrieve says: "I have marked severely on spelling, punctuation, and writing of memory gems for I believe that unless accuracy is acquired as early as possible in the child's school life, he is handicapped not only in the grades above and high school but through life.

"Again I wish to say that an English test like this one, given near the end of a term shows to me more than any other one thing the work that has been accomplished during the term by teacher and pupil.

"In entering upon the new year, may we all resolve to give the very best we have in equipping the young people intrusted to us with those things necessary to success in life. May the coming year be the most successful in the history of our schools.

"The following are summaries by grades of a similar test given one year ago and the present test:

WILLIAM E. SHAY SEEN IN "THE SOUL OF BROADWAY"

William E. Shay, most popular and versatile of screen stars, heads the noted cast of players appearing in support of Valeska Suratt in the new William Fox photodrama of the life of the "Gay White Way" which bears the alluring title "The Soul of Broadway." Few players are better known to photoplay fans than Mr. Shay, who has won immense popularity through his splendid impersonations of the leading male characters of such William Fox successes as "Kreutzer Sonata" "The Clemenceau Case," "Sin," and other big hits of the screen; and few are more eagerly looked for.

Mr. Shay is cast splendidly in "The Soul of Broadway," the part of Manning, the admirer of La Valencia, the role played by Miss Suratt, being singularly suited to his effective methods and masterly handling of big situations. The actor himself declares that never has he played a role that afforded him better opportunities. Mr. Shay's career before becoming united to the William Fox forces was a series of great dramatic triumphs both as star in Broadway productions and at the head of his own companies. He combines fire, magnetism and great dramatic power.

BORROWED TIMERS ELECT NEW COMMITTEEMEN

Disappointment reigned at yesterday's meeting of the Borrowed Time club, when the president announced to the membership the impossibility of hearing the Rev. M. J. Peters, rector of All Saints' Episcopal church make an address, upon a subject near to the hearts of everybody. Mr. Peters was unavoidable detained from attending the meeting by being called to Syracuse on business connected with his parish, but he promises to address the club at a very early date.

Yesterday's meeting resulted in the election, and in most instances, the re-election of officers for the ensuing year, as follows:

Dr. G. G. Whitaker suceeds himself as president; A. D. Clark succeeds himself as vice-president, and the energetic H. N. Gilbert holds over as secretary. Mr. S. P. Mason is elected chaplain, and Mr. A. B. Kellogg will be in charge of the finances of the club, succeeding the late Major Ferguson. The committee on entertainment comprises Messrs. S. P. Mason, E. W. Coe and S. C. Chandler.

EXAMINATION FOR COURT STENOGRAPHER

Applicants must be at least 25 years of age, and must have resided at least three months in the Fifth Judicial District, immediately preceding February 1st, 1916.

Application blanks must be obtained from the State Civil Service Commission and filed in their office at Albany, not later than February 1st, 1916.

SPORTSMEN WOULD STOCK THE CEMETERIES

B. —Songbirds in cemeteries. Tha e object sought by Audubon societ all over the country. It will be discussed at a banquet of the Western New York Sportsmen's Association in the Statler hotel January 14th. The purpose is to make each cemetery a bird sanctuary, wherein the robin, wren, larks, wild canaries and other feathered songsters can lift their sweet little voices without interference of the ruthless pot-hunter or sly cat.

The real, true sportsmen protect these songbirds, greeting them as welcome sights in thef orests, but the pot hunter who aims and fires at every moving and flying object is surely exterminating the bird family. And the pot hunter is being ably assisted by Pussy, who enjoys birdmeat on weekdays as well as on holidays.

Sportsmen prevailing upon superintendents of cemeteries to place birdhouses in all trees, to entice the feathery singers, and to spread appetizing cerels over the lawns. The English sparrow has monopolized all the nest spaces in cemeteries, and his day of luxury is past. Drive the sparrow on and give the songbirds a refuge from all their enemies are two things sportsmen hereabouts are going to accomplish in 1916.

Bowser's Old Coat

And Why the Rag Man Didn't Get It.

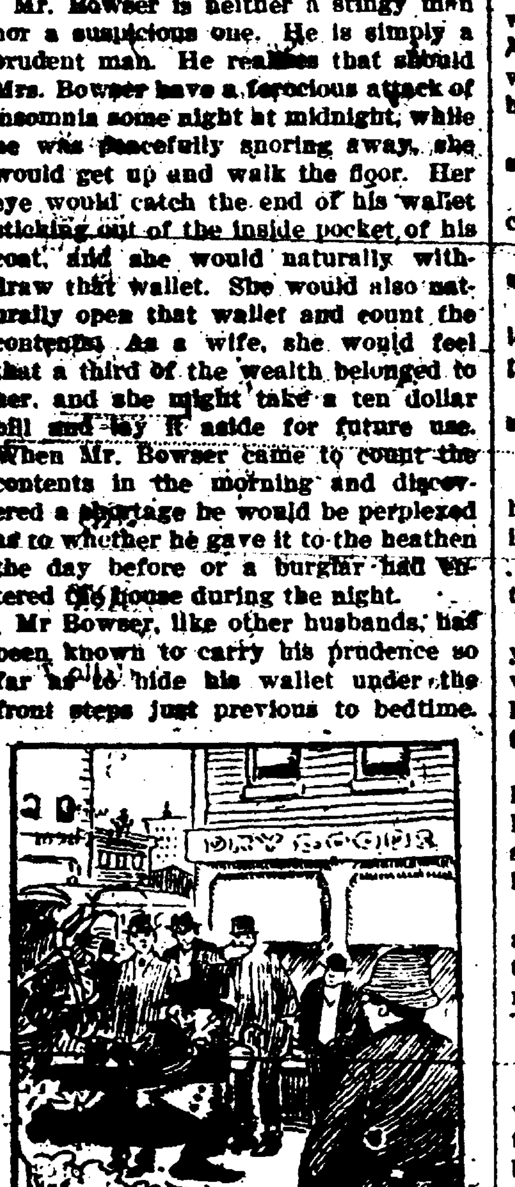
By M. QUAD

Copyright, 1915, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

References have been made in these articles to Mr. Bowser's wallet and the care he takes of it o' nights. Mr. Bowser inherited this prudence from male ancestors dating back hundreds of years. Only about one man in fifty—that is, one husband—leaves his wallet so carelessly about that it becomes a temptation to his wife.

Mr. Bowser is neither a stingy man nor a suspicious one. He is simply a prudent man. He realizes that should Mrs. Bowser have a ferocious attack of insomnia some night at midnight, while he was peacefully snoring away, she would get up and walk the floor. Her eye would catch the end of his wallet sticking out of the inside pocket of his coat, and she would naturally withdraw that wallet. She would also naturally open that wallet and count the contents. As a wife, she would feel that a third of the wealth belonged to her, and she might take a ten dollar bill and lay it aside for future use. When Mr. Bowser came to count the contents in the morning and discovered a shortage he would be perplexed as to whether he gave it to the heathen the day before or a burglar had entered the house during the night.

Mr Bowser, like other husbands, has been known to carry his prudence so far as to hide his wallet under the front steps just previous to bedtime.



HE WAS RACING AGAINST TIME

He has hidden it in the house in forty different places, and he has always heaved a great sigh of relief when he has found it safe in the morning. The other day, while hunting for an old hat in his clothes closet, he saw one of his old coats hanging on a hook. It had a tall pocket. The wallet might be placed in that pocket time after time and Mrs. Bowser would never discover it. He made a mental note of this, and that night the wallet rested in a new place.

Next morning as Mr. Bowser was yawning and stretching and preparing to arise and go down to his breakfast a dog fight took place in front of his house. He jumped out of bed and yelled to the smaller of the two dogs to go in and win. At the breakfast table he was still excited over the scrap, and when he started for his office the wallet still remained in the pocket of the old coat. He had street car tickets and did not discover the loss until he came to pay for his noonday luncheon. Then he could not pay. He had neither change nor wallet.

The waiter observed that no such game could be played on the house, and Mr. Bowser had to leave his watch as security for 30 cents. He remembered where he had left that wallet, and he started for home instanter. He did not take the trolley car. It was too slow for him. He started off on a fast walk, which gradually grew into a hobble and the hobble into a run. In the last half mile of the race he carried a red face, his eyes bulged out, and his hat was in his hand. Scores of men called to him to ask what was the matter, but he never answered nor paused for a moment. He was racing against time. At any moment Mrs. Bowser might find that wallet and extract a bill.

Mrs. Bowser got a great shock when Mr. Bowser burst into the hall and had to sit down on the lower step of the stairs and gasp for breath. While a hundred feet from his gate he had seen an old rag buyer pass out with a full sack over his shoulder. Perhaps Mrs. Bowser had been selling him his old clothes and that old coat was among the garments.

"What on earth is the matter?" she exclaimed, as she leaned against the wall for support.

"Did you—did you"—

"Did I what?"

"Did you sell that man any old clothes?"

"Why, yes. But what has that got to do with your coming home this time of day?"

"You—you sold my old clothes, did you? Woman, you have ruined me!"

And Mr. Bowser jumped up and dashed out of doors and down the steps and looked for the ragman. He was just turning a distant corner, and he was pursued. He entered a house two blocks below, and Mr. Bowser missed him. He was running about like a dog seeking a lost trail when a policeman stopped him and asked him if his house was on fire or his wife was dying. Just then the old ragman showed up a block away, and Mr. Bowser broke from the policeman's grasp and galloped away. The old man heard the clatter of his feet behind him and looked around, and then started off at his best pace. No old man can run very fast with a big sack bumping his back at every jump, and Mr. Bowser soon overhauled the fugitive and had the sack in his possession.

"What you fight me for?" was demanded of him.

"You bought some old clothes on Third place half an hour ago. I want a coat you bought."

"I no buy a coat there."

"Don't lie to me, you old villain! Where is that coat?"

And Bowser was pulling the garments out of his sack, and the old man was trying his hardest to prevent, when the policeman came up. In response to his demand, two stories were told, and as they did not agree he walked the two men to the station house. When the same two stories were told to the sergeant at the desk he replied:

"We will have the sack searched and see."

It was searched, and there was no coat in it.

"He stopped somewhere and hid it!" shouted Mr. Bowser.

"I no buy coat there. I no see wallet. I was some poor and honest man!" protested the old man.

"Is your wife at home?" asked the sergeant of Mr. Bowser.

"She is," was the reply.

"Then step to that telephone and ask her to come down here. You can wait in the back room until she arrives."

"But, man, I am Mr. Bowser!" roared the hero of the wallet and the old coat.

"That makes no difference to me. If your wife does not come down here I will have you locked up, and you might later tell your story in court. You seem to be a very bullheaded sort of man."

It took Mrs. Bowser over half an hour to dress and get down there. Mr. Bowser greeted her with almost a shout of relief, but the sergeant waved him aside with the words:

"You keep quiet, old man, while I ask your wife a few questions. Now, then, Mrs. Bowser, you sold this old man some old clothes, did you?"

"Yes, sir."

"How many garments in all?"

"Why, five or six, I guess. There were two old suits and parts of two or three more, and some of them had been lying around the house for two or three years."

"But this coat was an old brown one—a cutaway," put in Mr. Bowser.

"Didn't I tell you to keep still?" thundered the sergeant. "About sixty days behind the bars is what you seem to be aching for!"

"I didn't sell that one," said Mrs. Bowser. "I saw it hanging on the hook and thought you would need it when you were working about the house. No; I did not sell that one, and I felt in the pockets of all I did sell before I let them go. Besides this, I knew your wallet was in that coat, for I saw you hide it there last night."

"You are evidently a mean old husband," said the sergeant to Mr. Bowser. "I'll bet your wife don't get 10 cents a week for pin money. I will send an officer up with you to see if the story of the coat is true. It probably is, for I don't believe such a nice little woman would tell a lie about it."

And an officer accompanied them home and went upstairs and saw the coat with his own eyes. It was hanging there as safely as money in a savings bank. A tall pocket was investigated, and the missing wallet was brought forth and opened to the broad light of day.

"That's mine!" exclaimed Mr. Bowser as he reached for it.

"You are a nice old guy" said the officer as he handed the wallet over. "You not only hide your money for fear your wife may get hold of a dollar, but you go away and forget it and then create such a row that the whole county is asking who has been murdered in his bed. Say, old chap, you had better make a change or you will find yourself in a heap of trouble. Good day, Mrs. Bowser. I am sorry for you."

And when the officer had left the house Mr. and Mrs. Bowser sat down and looked at each other for a long, long time. Then Mrs. Bowser broke into a laugh and said:

"Mr. Bowser, this is the dead line. We will consult our respective lawyers and procure a divorce as soon as possible."

And something like a smile hovered around Mr. Bowser's mouth as he replied that, being it was a broken day, he would not go back to the office, but would stay home and fix the lower hinge on the front gate.

ONLY TWO CASES READY FOR TRIAL YESTERDAY

When Justice Hubbs reached the Court room in Oswego, yesterday, he found only two cases ready for trial this week. He immediately announced that he did not intend to have the jurors idling their time away with nothing to do, and would, if cases were not ready dismiss the jurors.

Most of the cases when called were marked reserved generally. A few had been settled and several others, including that of Vera Robinson Coyne vs. the executors of the estate of W. G. Robinson, deceased, were discontinued.

There were but two cases ready for trial today, one an action by the State of New York vs. Perry Bartlett to recover a penalty for alleged violation of thea gricultural law. Game Protector Claude J. Quick of Pulaski is the chiew witness for the State. A jury for this trial was drawn this morning.

The case of Martha E. Hunter vs. John J. Hart and James M. Hart, an action on a promisory note, was called and will probably be settled.

The following trial jurors were excused.

Timothy Burke, John Cole, Eugene Hamilton, Isaac E. Pool, Thomas J. Vickery, Oswego; Walter A. Barlow, Sandy Creek; Franklin C. Foster, Fulton; Wilbur Jordan, Mexico; William Nicholson, Fernwood; George Peck, Cleveland; Grant Wiedman, Fulton.

FORD'S PURPOSE TO COME LATER

Expedition Described by News Writer as Preliminary to Broader Plan to Come.

Washington—In an article under date of December 25, Mr. George E. Miller, Washington correspondent of the Detroit News, calls attention to the deliberate, concerted effort upon the part of many big newspapers of the country to cast odium upon the trip of Henry Ford to Europe in an effort for peace.

The Detroit News is one of the few big papers in the United States that have shown a spirit of fairness in the matter. There is missing from the News the spirit of malicious misrepresentation, coloring and deliberate falsehood so much in evidence in certain New York papers and in papers of smaller cities that ape the big city's news methods—all apparently set upon a determined effort to plunge the United States into the great war, and to discredit any effort that might shorten the conflict. Mr. Miller's story tells some of the motives behind the attacks on Mr. Ford.

The article says: —A persistent one could say wilful misconception and misstatement of Henry Ford's peace expedition is carried in the press of the east and also brought across the ocean in the British censored cables. Ford has deserted and the expedition is a failure, is the statement, accompanied with editorial comment in which Mr. Ford is patronizingly characterized as a generous soul but ignorant. The kindest thing some of these publications find to say about him is that he is a rainbow chaser with a good purpose and a poor plan for its accomplishment.

The New York papers almost without exception misrepresented the character of the Ford enterprise from the first. For this Mr. Ford was himself to blame to some extent as he failed to issue a comprehensive statement of his plan in the beginning. Newspapers disposed to be hostile towards any step to end the war took advantage of this to ridicule the expedition and their example has been very largely followed on both sides of the ocean. The papers controlled by the steel and munition interests have been the most persistent in declining to print the facts about the nature of Mr. Ford's project.

Yet it would not have been difficult for them to ascertain that this big body of people carried abroad in the Oscar II was not the real peace commission to carry out Mr. Ford's purpose. Though stated over and over again that the ship was chartered to attract the attention of the world to the peace plan, and for no oher purpose, this fact has been studiously ignored. And because the boys did not jump out of the trenches the moment the ship arrived in European waters, the whole Ford enterprise was and is denounced as a farcial failure. That the Oscar II was the advertisement of what is to follow has never been stated in the eastern papers. That there is to be a commission of responsible men to undertake the peace suggestions after the Oscar II passengers have returned to the United States has been carefully omitted from the papers which exhibit such apparent fear that Ford may bring about peace.

Of course the Ford enterprise may be a failure. Of that Mr. Ford freely acknowledged cognizance before he sailed from New York. But it is not fair nor just nor honest to denounce it as a failure before it has failed, and it hardly can fail until the commission which is to operate has tried. It is Mr. Ford's purpose to have this commission sit for months and even years if that be necessary. It is to be a body that will never cease to try for peace until the peace is secured: This was stated specifically to the eastern papers but is ignored by them in their attempts to rush the announcement of Ford's failure to the world.

Again much is made of the assertion that Ford has abandoned the peace expedition. Yet the eastern press was informed repeatedly that he did not know whether he would go to Europe in the first place nor whether he would remain long if he did go. There was doubt in Mr. Ford's mind as to whethe: he would be of any service in Europe.

He did not believe that his personal presence would be of aid. He finally was persuaded to go, but if he is returning now his friends who have understood his views will not interpret that for an admission by him that his peace plan is a failure. On the contrary they will understand that he can do more on this side the ocean than on that.

The people of the world will get their best opportunity to judge of the caliber of the Ford enterprise when they learn the personnel of the real peace commission. That has not been announced and cannot be until the crowd from the Oscar II has made the rounds of the neutral countries. When the expedition finally lands at The Hague the composition of the commission will be determined. After that perhaps long after that, will come the time to judge as to whether Mr. Ford has failed.

BELIEVE ONLY HALF YOU HEAR OF THE GOSPEL OF THE DEAD ONES

And of the Badness of Men Who Are Doing Real Things for Your Town

And then make up your mind to drink some water to wash down the rest you hear,

AND REMEMBER,

The People who libel Clean Propositions are the people who crawl into dark caves and pull the caves in after them, and do shut out the sunlight.

BEHOLD,

"None are so blind as those who will not see." And when the howlers against men who are DOING THINGS, and Propositions which are successful in spite of the lamentations of the dead ones, will not take what they have earned, in the way they should take it, then shall this city wax fat and the merchants shall wax strong.

A BIT OF THE GOSPEL OF GOOD TIMES FOR FULTON

PREACHER BLIND 22 YEARS.

Adventist, Eighty-two, Began at Age of Twenty to Spread the Gospel.

China, Me.—It was thirty years ago that Elder John Roberts Hall began preaching. Though totally blind for twenty-two years, he is still expounding the gospel from the pulpit of Advent churches.

He has preached in more than a hundred towns in Maine. He has gone into the remote coast villages and to many of the islands.

Though eighty-two years of age, every tooth in his head is sound, and he has complete upper and lower sets.

He was scarcely twenty years old when he conducted his first service. He began to preach regularly at twenty-two.

Mr. Hall never writes a sermon. He never makes notes of what he intends to say.

"I depend upon the spirit of God to quicken my understanding," he says.

Mr. Hall was stricken blind twenty-two years ago while chopping wood. He is able to walk about unaided in the town where he lives, but in other places he finds it necessary to have a companion. He still does farm work when at home. He likes the exercise and feels that it has contributed to his excellent health.

FIND FOUR POUND TOOTH.

Discovered in Gravel Pit in Illinois. Belonged to Prehistoric Animal.

Danville, Ind.—A gigantic tooth, believed to have belonged to some prehistoric animal, was found in a gravel pit at Hoopeston. Archie Dukes noticed the tooth in the gravel that had just been brought to the surface. It is of oval shape at the top, is about six inches in length and is two and one-half inches wide at one place. It weighs four and one-quarter pounds.

The ivory on the grinding surface of the tooth is in the form of edges or strips, arranged transversely, and in circular designs, with the dentine worn down between the cutting edges, which are about one-quarter of an inch apart. The cutting edges are black and still retain a brilliant polish. Judging from the size of the tooth, the jawbone of the animal must have been two or three feet in length.

FOUR MADE ILL BY HER UNCANNY POWER

"Witch's" Husband Joins Three Bedridden Sons.

Gloversville, N. Y.—John Bennett, aged, gaunt, helpless, husband of the mysterious woman who was known as the "Witch of the Adirondacks," lies ill of rheumatism in his isolated home at Hope, in wooded and mountainous Hamilton county. There, too, are his three sons, George, thirty-six years, who has been in bed twelve years; Ward, thirty-two, who has not risen from his pillow for fourteen years, and Wank, thirty, who has been bedridden for ten years.

The mother of this unfortunate trio, Mrs. Sarah Bennett, sixty years old, is in the State Asylum For the Insane at Utica. She was committed by Judge Wank Talbot of this place in May, 1914. While she dwelt in her lonely abode at Hope—so ill named for her and her family—she exercised an uncanny influence over her three sons.

Whether it was mesmerism or hypnotism—whatever was her power over them—they shrank and shivered before a glance from her gloomy, deep set eyes. She declared they were ill, that they must remain in bed, and there they stayed, year in and year out, their wills completely subservient to hers.

Their minds became weakened, their bodies atrophied from lack of exercise. They are really ill today, although the farmers whose homes are scattered thereabouts remember them as strapping youths. Frank, the youngest, is in the worst condition, paralyzed from the waist down. His brothers have had their beds moved nearer his that they may help him a little. While their mother lived with them she kept them secluded, yet she gave them care; the Humane society could not aid them; the authorities could not touch them. Their father earned a scanty living from the unwilling soil, but it sufficed.

Old man Bennett was himself susceptible to his wife's strange influence, but when she sought to exercise her power on him he fled and hid in the woods. Dr. E. F. Hagadorn is attending Bennett, who is seventy-one years old. The doctor says Bennett's condition is not serious, but any change must be for the worse.

UNTIL DOVE WINS OUT.

St. Paul Resident Refuses to Get a Hair Cut Until European War Ends.

St. Paul.—William A. Fischbach has undertaken not to have his hair cut till the European war ends.

Shaking his tawny mane, Fischbach says the Turks defending Constantinople have nothing on him.

THE CITY BEAUTIFUL

HOW CITY PLANNING MAY BE STARTED.

A Citizen May Initiate the Idea and a Permanent Organization Follow.

Often a single public spirited citizen with very little expenditure of effort can initiate a city planning movement, says Frank Koester. At an informal dinner the subject may be brought up and the first steps taken—that is, to interest a few men of prominence in the idea. A committee may then be judiciously selected of those who are willing to lend the weight of their names to the undertaking.

A permanent organization of some size is then formed, which may be known as the Civic Improvement or City Planning association. It should be representative of the most prominent members of the different professions and should include in its membership leading business men, bankers, lawyers, editors, clergymen, architects, engineers, painters, sculptors, educators, representatives of various public welfare societies, the mayor of the city, commissioners of public works and perhaps also leading representatives of outlying communities. The newspapers will, of course, have been interested in the movement from the outset.

The first step is to raise a fund for purposes of securing plans and meeting the expense of the movement, and this may be accomplished either by an appropriation made by the municipal authorities, by donation from a philanthropist or by a general public subscription. It is advisable to have as great a general interest as possible created in the subject, as it will thus receive a degree of support which would not be accorded it were its activities confined to a limited number.

One of the best means of arousing public interest in city planning is the giving of public lectures on the subject by experts. Such a lecturer should always be obtained whatever the plan followed, and the lecture should be accompanied by illustrations of what has been done and is contemplated in other cities.

When the work of the expert has been completed a public exhibition should be held of the drawings and plans, and they should be subjected to the criticism of the public at large and discussed in public meetings and in the press.

To Develop New Jersey.

Plans for the development of New Jersey along various lines have been outlined in a report submitted by a special committee of the department of conservation and development, appointed to formulate a program for the ensuing year.

Among other things it is proposed to establish a "Jersey day," for the education and enlightenment of the public as to the opportunities in the state; to organize an adjunct or advisory body to aid the department to inaugurate a public market system; to prepare a list of unused properties in connection with a labor employment bureau; to strive for the betterment of public roads; to advertise the state's advantages and to bring about closer co-operation between various departments.

Picturesque Water Fountain.

A water tower of both artistic and substantial structure is shown in the accompanying photograph. It was built by the Chicago Bridge and Iron works for the village of Riverside, Ill. It replaces a brick tower, built in 1870, which supported a wooden tank. This tank had to be rebuilt once or twice, and finally, in 1913, it was burned, in spite of the fact that it contained water. It was then decided to put up a more satisfactory tower, and, under the supervision of Dabney Maury and Douglas Graham as consulting engineers and W. D. Mann as architect, the present tank was erected.

The plan involved carrying out the appearance of the original brick tower, while adding twenty feet to its height. An elliptical bottom steel tank of 150,000 gallon capacity was installed. The steel plate roof and ornamentation, as well as the new brickwork, complete the simple, harmonious and effective design.—American City.

BUNGALOW FIRE HOUSE TYPE IS GROWING IN FAVOR.

Stations of This Kind Are Popular In the West.

A new fire station of the bungalow type has been erected at Byberry, Pa., on the outskirts of Philadelphia. This type has found much favor in western cities.

It is believed that by having the men at all times upon the same floor with the apparatus the time required in responding to a call will be reduced considerably. The single floor will do away with the sliding pole and the stairway by which firemen have been injured in the hurry after an alarm. This time reducing, coupled with the fact that the apparatus is motorized, is expected to lessen the fire loss in any community where the fire station must cover a large territory.

The station at Byberry is in the country, and an excellent view is afforded from each window. The south side of the building holds a dormitory with twelve beds. The north side has the captain's office and quarters, a drying room for clothing and a large lounging room for the firemen. This room has a gas cooking range, on which meals may be prepared by men unable to go to their homes. The main portion of the building, the center, is paved with wooden blocks. The signal boards and telephones are in a raised alcove in the main room. Two electrically lighted pits facilitate working under the motor apparatus.

BEAUTIFUL HIGHWAYS.

Planting Shade Trees in Municipalities and Highways Advocated.

Recent comments urging the removal of the ugly roadside signboard and the planting of shade trees on the road, says the Country Gentleman, bring the following suggestion from a California reader:

"I believe the time is ripe for a vigorous campaign favoring the beautifying of our highways. California is rapidly spending a recent appropriation of $18,000,000 on permanent state roads, and Riverside county has a large force supplementing these state roads with county roads from a recent appropriation. The beautification of these roads should follow. One per cent of the cost of many of the roadbeds would plant their borders to suitable trees."

No one questions the desirability of road improvement or the value it adds to local property. Only a demonstration in some favored locality like California is required to give the movement impetus. We may take a lesson from city experience, and our correspondent tells the story for Riverside:

"Twelve years ago systematic beautification of our city was undertaken. The matter was too new for our city government to take up at once. It was put up to the people. The chamber of commerce raised a liberal sum, and planting was commenced at once. Within a year the city authorities took over the work, appointed a tree warden—the first in the west—and appropriated funds. Within five years 15,000 trees were planted. Within five years nine southern California cities adopted municipal control of their trees. Real estate men place the commercial value to our own little city at over $1,000,000."

Roadside tree planting is a formidable proposition, but it is possible if planned for a period of ten to twenty years.

City to Plant Trees.

Park Commissioner Ingersoll of Brooklyn announced recently that he had made arrangements to plant 600 trees in Bedford avenue in the three mile stretch between Eastern parkway and Taylor street. Frederic B. Pratt has made a very generous contribution to a fund for buying trees, and this, Commissioner Ingersoll said, made it possible to start this big planting experiment in Bedford avenue.

"When I became park commissioner of Brooklyn I discovered that the borough was losing trees at the rate of about 1,500 a year and only about 1,000 a year were being planted. I started a movement for voluntary associations in the work of tree planting, and it has been very successful.

"It seems strange that in these days of automobile travel the death of many trees is due to horse bites. We found that 50 per cent of the trees that died had their bark gnawed by horses. It is against the law to tether a horse to a tree. We have solicited the co-operation of the police and have called on property owners to put wire guards around trees. Some 5 per cent of the trees die of gas poisoning."

As a means of cooling the paths and soothing the thoughts of citizens of New York city in the more or less good old summer time the Merchants' association is asking park commissioners in all boroughs to plant trees along streets. These trees recently were offered by the state conservation commission at a very moderate rate, and the association suggests planting them in parks until they are big enough to be set out along thoroughfares.

The planting of trees both for the sake of beauty and utility, is being adopted by many municipalities.

THE BOYS' CHRISTMAS.

How These Difficult Members of the Family May Be Pleased.

Christmas books are a safe and valuable standby. A subscription to any of the several good young people's periodicals is in the same category. A scrap album, with an accompanying pair of clipping shears, suggests itself with these, as does a portfolio, diary or pocket memorandum.

A fountain pen or a screw pencil with always and forever a good knife is more of the stationer's stock that is sure to please. A clock for the boy's room or a calendar may also be considered.

A boy who has got to turnover collars and vests will rejoice in a card plate and cards, with, of course, a neat little case. The same young gentleman will also be glad of a natty umbrella, with his name somewhere on the handle. His less aspiring brother one or two years younger, will be quite as well pleased with one of the school sort. His name may be stamped on a bit of white linen and fastened to one of the ribs on the inside, close to the stick. This is not for ornament but solely for purposes of identification.

If a boy is a camper anything to add to this outfit will meet with his approval. A rubber coat, extra high boots or a blanket of the same material, a field or opera glass, folding drinking cup, tourist's notebook—these and more readily suggest themselves.

Money in a purse or a purse without the money pleases a boy. So do a cup and saucer for his special use, a fruit knife or napkin ring; games, either new ones or a good set of the old dominos, checkers, chess or a pack of cards in a case. Boys like any sort of musical instrument, from a harmonicon up. A boy to whom Christmas last year brought one of the cheap but not unmusical music boxes amused himself for hours at a time with its easily learned tunes. An accordion is acceptable—to the boy, not to his neighborhood.

To a young book lover a set of shelves for his treasures is a genuine pleasure. They may be had from $3.50 upward, even the cheapest being well finished with brass rod for a curtain to which the boy will not object. A desk is another piece of furniture which a boy of any size, from the four-year-old with his miniature one not a foot and a half high to his big brother who wants a "roll top" that locks, will welcome. A chair for his individual use at table is sometimes a doubly happy thought, gratifying its recipient and usefully supplementing the dining room furniture.

The New Waists.

To be worn with the suit to give the effect of a complete costume is the waist that matches in color at least, if not the material. Flesh color and white are always dressy and, with a touch of the color of the suit added to them, give a charming effect and the necessary connecting link.

Chiffon, georgette crape, net or tulle in a shade to match the suit is made up over white lace. Often the lace sleeves are left uncovered with the darker hued material. Marquisette is a material that will be frequently used for this purpose.

The less dressy waist of crepe de chine is made on military lines, with high collar, epaulets, long sleeves and many buttons. Military colors are added as a decoration.

Collars are either high or low and flat, seldom a combination of the two or of the convertible type of which there were so many last season. Sleeves are, as stated before, long, and in many cases they are tight fitting while others are loose from shoulder to wrist, with tight wristbands.

He Showed Them How to Do It

By DONALD CHAMBERLIN

During the latter part of the last century a great deal of whisky was distilled in the Tennessee mountains on which no tax was paid. One day a man appeared among the government officials who were endeavoring to hunt down a man named Hardwick, who had been for some time running a still concealed in the mountains and had thus far defied every effort on the part of the officials to trap him.

"What's the matter with you fellows," said the newcomer, "that you haven't got Hardwick? He's got to be taken and right away."

"All right, Mr. Barker," said Williams, the man addressed; "we'll do the job under your direction. Lead on."

Half a dozen men having been collected for the purpose, Barker started up the mountain side, followed by the others, and after a long and difficult ascent came upon a woman sitting on a rock crying bitterly.

"What's the matter?" asked Barker.

"Matter? Matter enough. Look a-yere." Pulling up her sleeve, she showed a welt that had evidently been made by a lash.

"Who did that?" asked Barker.

"My husband."

"Who is your husband?"

"Jim Hardwick."

Barker opened his eyes and looked knowingly at his men.

"Where is Hardwick?" he asked the woman.

"Reckon he's gone up to the"— She checked herself. "Who air you uns anyway?"

"I don't mind your knowing that we're revenue men, and we're going to get Jim Hardwick dead or alive!"

The woman stopped crying and looked fixedly at the men.

"I don't want you to kill him," she said, "but"—

"You mean," said Barker, "that you'd like to see him punished for his treatment of you?"

"Reckon I would."

"I'll tell you what I'll do. You help us get him and we'll give you $100."

The woman's face took on a covetous look. Barker followed up his advantage. "Show us the way to the still and keep him talking till we can surround it."

"What'll you do with him?"

"We'll turn him over to you."

He counted out ten crisp treasury notes and handed them to the woman. She took them hesitatingly, as though she did not quite like the job.

Half an hour later the revenue men, led by the woman, had come to a ravine. She paused and said: "The still's up thar. Ef you uns stop this end of the ravin' he can't git out; you got him shore." Barker dashed forward, ordering the others to follow. Williams called to him to wait a moment—perhaps the woman was deceiving them—but Barker paid no attention to him, and he went on with the rest. They found the climbing difficult, but pushed on, Barker displaying an energy that put the rest to shame. Williams alone hung back, bringing up the rear. But nothing like a still appeared. Then the men began to tire of the difficult climb and one by one fell to the rear. Barker, coming to a perpendicular cliff, stopped, waiting till the others came up. Nothing was said till Williams joined them.

"Waal?" he said doubtfully.

"Where's the woman?" asked Barker.

All looked about for her, but she was not to be seen.

"I tell you, Mr. Barker," said Williams, "where I reckon she is."

"Where?"

"With that hundred dollars you give her. And I reckon the hundred dollars is whar the still is. And I don't reckon the still is in this yere ravine neither."

There was an ominous silence.

"I reckon," said Williams, "that we uns might as well go home. Before we could find the still—and I reckon we couldn't—the bull thing would be cleaned out."

"Do you think so?" asked Barker absently. He was thinking of the hundred dollars that he had given the woman and that he had intended to charge up to the government, but that now he would not dare to mention, and it would be a dead loss to himself. He was soon convinced by the others that to try to find either the still or Hardwick or his wife would be like hunting for a needle in a haystack. Mournfully he led the way down the mountain that he had climbed with such high hopes. When he came to the place where he had first seen the woman, there she was in her cabin near by washing dishes as unconcernedly as if nothing unusual had happened.

"Did you uns git him?" she asked with well affected interest.

No reply was made, and she continued:

"Waal, I reckon you didn't or you would have brought him along. Since I didn't help you out I reckon I orter give you back the money." She handed Barker the hundred dollars, which he took shamefacedly, then without a word continued the descent.

"Gittin' moonshiners," said Williams to Barker, "ain't such easy work after all."

"No," said the man who had come to Tennessee to show them how to do it; "I can't say it is. Don't you fellows say anything about this affair, and I'll report to Washington that you work under serious disadvantages."

THIS dress of French taffeta is very interesting because of its puffed overskirt. The skirt consists of bustle effect drapings at the hips and pays no attention to the mode for slimness. Metallic braid edges the bottom of the tunic, which is caught up short in front and falls in deep points toward the back over a lace petticoat. Soft folds of metallic-meshed lace fashion the upper part of the bodice and sleeves, while the lower part of the bodice is of taffeta. Satin slippers to match are worn. ANNA MAY.

Neat Little Apron For Housework.

Apron of plain gingham with lower part cut in rounded outline and the upper part made to entirely cover the waist.

There are many attractive ways to make aprons, but it is only the design that combines the practical with the stylish that wins genuine success. Here, for instance, is a model that will please the most critical. It is pretty, costs but little to duplicate and when finished can easily be slipped on over the head.

A pretty idea for the apron is to make it of plain lawn or gingham, with an outline of rickrack or similar braid. In medium size the apron requires 2 yards of 36-inch material, hence its cost can be kept within twenty-five cents very easily.

By placing the front and back section of the panel directly along the lengthwise fold of the gingham the principal part of the apron will be cut out and there will be no seam. The remaining sections, the belt and the pocket are laid on a lengthwise thread of the material, though the belt may be cut crosswise, if preferred. Where a checked or striped fabric is used instead of a plain color it always adds to the effect to have the lines of the belt run in a different direction.

The making of the apron is as simple as the cutting. First close the center-back seam, indicated by large "O" perforation, then sew the belt to lower edge of back, notches and center-backs even. The large "O" perforation in the belt indicates the center-front. Close the belt in front with a button and buttonhole and stitch the braid around the entire apron and pocket.

The front of the pocket is indicated by the large "O" perforations. Adjust to position on apron, upper edge of pocket along crossline of small "o" perforations.

A design like this can be made in less than an hour by even an inexperienced home dressmaker.

HER LOVE AND FROGS

By M. QUAD

Copyright, 1915, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

"The Swamp farm," as it was called, was situated four miles out of Dayton and was owned by the Widow Bliss.

The tin peddler, the sewing machine agent, the book canvasser, the patent-right man and many others who came that way saw, admired and were ready to love the owner of the Swamp farm. She admitted to herself that it might be better if she had a good husband, but she had a "nay" for all these men except one. He was a Mr. William Burton. He was a man just about her age and ranked as an old bachelor. Mr. Burton didn't begin as most of the others had. He had the sense to admire the widow without telling her that he admired.

Mr. Burton could talk of soils, crops, swamps, the weather and a hundred other things and never let a hint fall that he intended some day to talk of love and matrimony. The widow mentally pitied him for this, and yet she felt a bit piqued.

Mr. Burton was a surveyor, and his duties called him into the neighborhood of the Swamp farm about once a week. He could probably have made it once in two weeks and perhaps once in four, but it's none of our business. Along about Wednesday in every week the widow would look out of the front door and see Mr. Burton surveying or pretending to. He would look up by accident and see her standing there and would be invited in to drink a glass of fresh buttermilk.

This thing had gone on for a long, long time when he called one day, not to survey her garden, but to sit in the house and talk.

"Widow, I have been coming here a long time," he began.

"And it has tired you out?" she laughed in reply.

"Not a bit. I came today to ask you to be my wife."

"Mr. Burton," replied the widow, "I made up my mind about this marriage question quite a long time ago. I shall marry the man who can tell me how to make money out of my old swamp. When I am sure that he has told me right he may bring in the preacher."

"That old swamp has been a bleak spot for fifty years," he said after a time. "By the way, you don't own all the swamp, do you?"

"No. There's twenty-eight acres of it that belong to Mr. Cooper, but he can't do anything more with his part than I can with mine."

Mr. Burton walked down to the edge of the swamp and back again, and then he sat down and took his head in his hands and thought and thought. By and by he looked up with a bright smile on his face and said:

"Mrs. Bliss, I have got it. I have solved the problem. You are to turn that swamp into a frog farm!"

"Gracious me, but whoever heard of such a thing?" she exclaimed.

"Lots of folks have heard of it. There are half a dozen men in this state who are raising frogs for the market and making a heap of money out of it."

"But I never heard of any one selling frogs," persisted the widow. "Would any one in Dayton eat a frog, much less buy one?"

"Not in Dayton," he laughed, "but in New York. They are on the bills of fare at most hotels and restaurants and are considered a great delicacy. They eat only the hind legs."

It was a week later that men and boys called at the Swamp farm with pails and baskets and paper bags.

When the widow had bought 600 big and little frogs and paid out so much money that she had to let her taxes slip by she went down to the swamp one morning to have a look at her "live stock."

Not a frog was in sight this morning, not a big one or a little one. That swamp was absolutely without life.

The widow ran back to the house and arrived there just a minute before Mr. Burton appeared.

"I—I was going to send for you!" she gasped.

"What has happened?" he asked.

"Every frog has disappeared!"

"You don't say!"

"Come along and see for yourself."

He walked along down to the swamp with her, and she heard him chuckling as he walked. Instead of looking over the swamp to see if he could solve the problem he sat down on a log and began to laugh.

"What do you mean, Mr. Burton?" was almost demanded.

"I was to tell you how to make money out of this old swamp."

"Yes, you said you could, but it seems you have only shown me how to lose money instead."

"You are wrong, widow—you are wrong," said Mr. Burton. "You see, there were twenty-eight acres which you didn't own. I bought them. When you had 600 frogs on your side of the swamp I threw a lot of frog food in on my side. Last night your 600 came over the line. They are now my property."

The widow looked at him with mingled amazement and indignation.

"Oh, don't look that way," he laughed. "I am now going to tell you how you may make the money."

"How—how"— she stammered.

"Why, marry the man who owns the 600 frogs!" he replied.

And after about a month she did. She not only made money out of the frog farm, but she got a good husband besides, and that is something that money cannot buy.

PRACTICAL HEALTH HINT.

Gargle For Sore Throat.

If the throat tickles and feels raw gargle with a mixture of boric acid — four heaping teaspoonfuls dissolved in a pint of boiling water. Use this when cool three or four times a day. If the throat appears very red use a gargle composed of glycerin, one tablespoonful, and water, three tablespoonfuls. When gargling, throw the head as far back as possible for comfort and gargle thoroughly.

The KITCHEN CUPBOARD

WINTER VEGETABLES.

CURRIED TOMATOES.—Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter, add one teaspoonful of chopped onion and cook until yellow, then add six sliced tomatoes and cook gently until soft. Mix one tablespoonful of flour with one teaspoonful of curry powder, one-half teaspoonful of salt and a few grains of cayenne pepper, moisten with one-half cupful of cream, pour the mixture over the tomatoes, stir until thick and serve on hot buttered toast.

Potted Haricot Beans.—Potted haricot beans are made by first soaking the beans over night. Then skin them and cook until tender in boiling salted water with two onions. Drain away all water, mash smooth with drippings of butter, season agreeably with salt, pepper and nutmeg, remembering that rigorous exclusion of air will insure freshness for at least two weeks.

How to Make "Mulligan."—Butter the size of an egg, one onion, one small head of cabbage, one can of tomatoes, salt, pepper and paprika to taste. Put the butter in a saucepan, let it melt, then add the onion cut in slices, allow it to brown; then put in the cabbage, which has been chopped up or run through a meat chopper. Let the mixture cook slowly, stirring it often so as not to let it burn. After it has cooked for twenty minutes or half an hour add the tomatoes and seasoning and cook slowly two or three hours.

Parsnips.—If the parsnips are young scrape and lay in cold water, but if old they will have to be pared and split lengthwise. Let young parsnips cook in a porcelain kettle in salted water for forty-five minutes, but old parsnips must boil about an hour and a quarter. Drain and serve with drawn butter.

Baked Macaroni and Cheese.—One-half pound of macaroni broken fine and cooked in plenty of hot salted water twenty minutes. Turn into a colander and pour cold water over it. Make a sauce of two cupfuls of hot milk, one large tablespoonful of butter, one tablespoonful of flour and salt to taste. Put a layer of grated or prepared cheese in bottom of baking dish, then a layer of macaroni, then sauce, and repeat until the dish is almost full. Cover with breadcrumbs and butter. Bake till brown.

SPORT SKIRTS AND BLOUSES

New York—Just when the weather bureau furnishes its most formidable supply of weather, giving us alternate doses of slush and ice, the shops blossom out in sales of dainty lingerie and advance showings of Summer modes and fabrics, that make one for the time, oblivious of outside temperatures, until at the door one snuggles into warm wraps and furs and comes back to January realities.

Philippine Embroideries

Lingerie hand-embroidered and hand-made from the Philippines is an enticing novelty of the season.

The nainsooks, mulls, wash crepes and washable satins are sent to the islands, where all the dainty stitchery is wrought, and patterns embroidered derived from bridal chests of Spanish Senoritas generations ago. Exquisite creations in "Intimate Wear" that reflect the romance and mystery of old Spain, yet marked at figures that bring them within reach of a modest allowance. Considerable use is made of wide washable ribbons run through embroidered slashes and sheer hems of net or Georgette crepe that trim the washable satin and crepe de chine garments that are at once luxurious, and practical. Smocking is another favorite embellishment, and gowns of tinted mull smocked in white are especially pretty.

McCall Design

Sport Skirts

Sport skirts are boot top length and make great use of pockets, buttoned flaps and belt girdles, patent leather belts slipped through eyelets that appear to hold the shirrings at the waist are a fetching feature. Deep slashed pockets lined with white, rose, maize or green, are smart and novel.

Patch pockets slit down the center forming little reveres caught with buttons are new and pretty and huge bag like pockets with overlapping flaps trim the hips of other models.

Materials

The materials are fine cotton gabardines, golf cords, corduroy, washable flannels, and two toned velvets. Belgian linens of heavy texture and Bedford cord cottons. While white is most used, colored skirts are excellently endorsed, varying from modest beiges and tans to the most vivid corals and emerald green. Sport coats contrast or match one color of the striped skirt which is much in evidence at Palm Beach, and other resorts, and silk jerseys are as much worn as last season though the tailored jacket is a bit smarter just now and velveteen makes a great many sport coats.

New Blouses

Whether a woman goes South or stays at home, she is always interested in the showing of new blouses, and spite of the perils of the seas buyers from the prominent shops are constantly crossing to Paris in search of novelties in these garments. For wear with sport skirts shirts are plain and beautifully cut and tailored, with little embroidery except for the fancy scalloped edgings of the front and collar and flaring cuff that is featured in a few models.

Dress Blouses

Georgette crepe by itself, or combined with Pussy Willow and other wash silks is perhaps first favorite in materials for more pretentious waists but taffeta and crepe de chine are close followers in fashionable favor. Collars vary from very high chin enveloping styles to wide turn back models that have quite cape-like proportions, and large reveres of fichu style are a notable development at once becoming and smart.

January Chances

The shops are all offering wonderful chances for profitable investment of Christmas money, in garments for immediate wear as well as in advance warm weather styles. Furs are reduced to figures that seem especially attractive when all the coldest weather is yet to come. Smart full length coats of seal, dyed muskrat trimmed with skunk and other pelts, and of caracul similarly combined are in many cases priced at a third less than at the beginning of the season I was told at C. C. Shayne and Co., and the demand for foxes, in cross and black, blue and white, or red skins shows no sign of waning.

Beaver continues in excellent vogue, and is one of the most durable of furs.

WIDER USE FOR SCHOOLS.

Increasing Tolerant Spirit In Letting the Buildings For Various Purposes.

The federal bureau of education has been making a study of the wider use of school buildings. The bureau finds an increasingly tolerant spirit manifested in the school letting regulations and cites as an illustration a rule adopted by the school board in Long Branch, N. J., after the opening of the new building, as follows:

"It shall be open to all meetings of citizens for the discussion of public questions intended to benefit the city, for meetings of civic clubs, for meetings of associations of unrestricted membership, whose object is improvement or public welfare, as women's clubs, choral societies, etc.; for entertainments and lectures to which the public is admitted free or of which, if admission is charged, the proceeds are for the benefit of the general public."

Commenting on the difficulties which may result from such a wide grant of privileges, the report says:

"The difficulty inherent in applying such a hospitable rule is that of making certain that public motives predominate over private motives in the purposes of the group desiring to use the buildings. A solution of this problem which is widely favored is the requirement of unrestricted membership already mentioned in the Long Branch rule. Wisconsin, California, Indiana and Maryland have made it obligatory by legislative enactment upon school boards to grant the privileges of school edifices to all nonpartisan, nonsectarian and nonexclusive organizations without cost."

Summing up the great advantages to be gained by using the vast equipment of school accommodations during periods of popular leisure, outside of school hours, the bureau points to the following possible results:

First.—Purveying beneficial amusements to those who are prevented by fatigue from engaging in active play and who otherwise might receive their satisfaction at the hands of unscrupulous venders.

Second.—Stimulating the growth of those groups which are capable of self organization and government by furnishing them with meeting places.

Third.—Promoting the formation and vigor of groups which might be incited to self expression by furnishing both quarters and leadership.

"In these ways," concludes the report, "public education is extending its distinctive function of improving human society. That this work will undergo still greater and more systematic extension is clearly foreshadowed by the trend of present developments and the persistency of the forces behind them."

GIRLS GET BIRD CATCHER.

Wellesley Students Now to Dissect Sparrows Instead of Cats.

Boston.—Wellesley college, the home of beauty and culture, now has an official sparrow chaser. He is John H. Oakes, and he receives $40 a month for catching birds for dissection.

Cats were used formerly at Wellesley for dissecting, but this was discontinued when one of the college janitors was haled into court on the charge of stealing a prize cat. President Ellen Fitz Pendleton was threatened with a summons by Chief of Police Hiram Brown, and cats thereafter were shunned.

Oakes has a number of traps which he places in the fields around Wellesley.

Rare Cactus Blossoms.

Chicago.—A night blooming cactus in the yard of M. G. Peterson at 1419 Emerson street, Evanston, which blooms once every six years, started to flower, was in full bloom in a few hours and then closed for another six years. The family almost missed seeing the plant in full bloom. They were at an amusement park and didn't get home until the blossom started to close. The flower is about ten inches in diameter.

Another Triumph by Mme. Cheruit

Copyright, 1915, by Philippe Ortiz, New York.

THIS adorable child was garbed by Mme. Cheruit for the recent fashion fete, La Grande Couture Francaise, under the auspices of Vogue, New York. The material is white charmeuse, as is the matching bonnet, quilted along all borders and fastened with innumerable ball buttons, all of which envelop a quite satisfactory "Cupidon."

The fact that small turbans have come into fashion suddenly and have been accepted by the smartest of young women has caused a good deal of perplexity among those who have put their money in the high crowned hat. They were inaugurated by two young brides, who appeared simultaneously with them as an evidence that they were quite the correct thing. They were flat, simply trimmed and were not titled over one eye. They showed a good deal of the rippling hair. One was so small it looked like a skullcap.

Evening Gown Without Lace.

An evening gown fashioned of soft cream colored crepe Georgette which owes much of its daintiness to the absence of lace trimming.

This unusually effective costume is made of crepe Georgette, and the distinguishing feature about it is the absence of lace trimming. In medium size for the waist and gathered skirt the frock requires 4¾ inches wide of 44-inch material, with 2¾ yards material 44 inches wide for foundation gores.

The underbody is made first as a foundation for the waist, the lower edges of the front and back being pleated first by placing "T" on small "o" perforations. Close underarm and shoulder seams as notched and turn hem in the back. Hem the neck and tack straps to position over the shoulder, front edges of straps at indicating small "o" perforations in underbody front and back. Adjust stay to position, and then the underbody will be ready for the overbodice.

The outer front and back are in one, and the underarm seam is first closed as notched. After hemming the back gather the lower edge between double "TT" perforations, and 2 inches above; gather on crosslines of small "o" perforations near upper edges. Arrange on under-body, center-fronts, centerbacks and underarm seams even; stitch lower edges together. Stitch gathers near upper edge to position along crossline of small "o" perforations in underbody.

Sleeves—Close seams as notched. Gather on crosslines of single small "o" perforations; draw gathers to the required size and stitch tape under gathers. Sew in armhole as notched, small "o" perforation at shoulder seam easing any fulness.

Next join gores of skirt as notched and close the back seam from large "O" perforation to lower edge, finish edges above the perforation for a placket. Close back seam of gathered skirt from large "O" perforation to lower edge, finish edges above perforation for a placket. If desired draped at sides, pleat, bringing the single "T" perforations to corresponding small "o" perforations and tack. Gather on double "oo" perforations near upper edge. Arrange on foundation gores, center-fronts and center-backs even; stitch gathers along upper edge of foundation, large "O" perforation at side seam. Adjust skirt to position, stitching upper edge over upper row of gathers in waist, center-fronts and center-backs even. Tack pleats to position, bringing single large and double small "oo" perforations to corresponding perforations in foundation.

The drapery at the side of the skirt may be caught with artificial flowers, which are quite the vogue for dress trimmings this season.

Pictorial Review Costume No. 6498. Sizes 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42 inches bust. Price, 15 cents.

MOWING DOWN AN ARMY.

If an Armored Automobile Could Be Built Like a Battleship.

"The captain of the Pennsylvania will wield a weapon more intrinsically powerful than the German standing army, and his control of it will be more absolute than is the kaiser's control of that army." This surprising statement is made by Rear Admiral Bradley A. Fiske in Popular Science Monthly.

After comparing the fighting strength and mobility of a great battleship and an army in the field Rear Admiral Fiske says:

"Possibly the declaration may be accepted now that a battleship of 30,000 tons, such as the navies are building, with, say, twelve twelve-inch guns, is a greater example of power, under the absolute direction and control, than anything else existing, and that the main reason is the concentration of a tremendous amount of mechanical energy in a very small space, all made available by certain properties of water. Nothing like a ship can be run on shore, but if an automobile could be constructed carrying twelve twelve-inch guns, twenty-one five-inch guns and four torpedo tubes the size of the Pennsylvania's and with her armor, able to run over the land in any direction at twenty knots, propelled by engines of 30,000 horsepower, it could whip an army of 1,000,000 men just as quickly as it could get hold of its component parts. Such a machine could start at one end of an army and go through to the other like a mowing machine through a field of wheat, and knock down all the buildings afterward, smash all the cars, break down all the bridges and sink all the shipping."

HE WAS REALLY TOO BRIGHT.

It Worried the Baby's Mother to Find Him So Clever.

"Oh, George," cried young Mrs. Merry, running to meet her husband at the door, "I've something the best to tell you!"

"No!" said George. "What is it?"

"Why don't you think—the baby can talk! Yes, sir, actually talk! He's said ever and ever so many things. Come right into the nursery and hear him."

George went on.

"Now, baby," said mamma persuasively, "talk some for papa. Say 'How do you do, papa?'"

"Goo, goo, goo, goo," says baby.

"Hear him!" says mamma ecstatically. "Wasn't that just as plain as plain can be?"

George says it is and tries to think so too.

"Now say 'I'm glad to see you, papa.'"

"Da, da, boo, boo, boo!"

"Did you ever?" cries mamma. "He can just say everything. Now, you precious little honey bunny boy, say 'Are you well, papa?'"

"Boo, ba, de, goo, goo."

"There it is," said mamma. "Did you ever know a child of his age who could really talk as he does? He can just say everything he wants to, can't you, you own dear little darling precious you?"

"Hear that? He says 'Of course I can,' just as plainly as anybody could say it. Oh, George, it really worries me to have him so phenomenally bright. These very brilliant babies nearly always die young."—Pittsburgh Press.

WOUNDED CRY FOR MOTHERS.

Some Keep Up the Pitiful Pleadings Throughout the Night.

A psychological feature at Trieste that is similar to other fronts is that the wounded in the field always cry for their mothers. Officers who have fought on the western front say that the wounded who lay in the woods of Argonne and elsewhere on this front made the battlefield resound all night long with their cries for mother, and they observed particularly that both the Germans and French did the same and that this was particularly true of new troops and in the earlier part of the war.

Officers from the trenches said it was heartrending to hear the pitiable cries after charges, especially at night, those of the Italian soldiers crying "Mamma mia, mamma mia!" often mixing it with sobs and dying lower and lower as unconsciousness approached. But many kept up the call for hours.

MANY TOPICS FOR GROWERS

Markets and Distribution to Form Live Subjects at Fruit Growers' Convention.

The program of the sixty-first annual meeting of the Western New York Horticultural Society is attractive because of the variety of topics and the reputation of the speakers engaged. For the three days beginning January 26h, many hundreds of fruit growers will attend the convention, to be held in Convention Hall, Rochester.

Marketing and Distribution

Fruit growers are realizing the necessity of a better system of distributing their products, Bewerelly T. Gallaway, the new dean of the College of Agriculture of Cornel University will, at them eeting, make his first address before a body of New York State fruit growers. He will speak on "Problems in the Marketing and Distribution of Fruit, With Special Reference to Conditions in New York State."

In his paper on "Injurious Insects, Old and New," Professor Parrott, of the Geneva Experiment Station, will discuss some promising results obtained against the pear psylla, and will direct attention to new fruit pests, such as the cherry leaf bettle, pear thrips and leopard moth. "What of the Future?" is the subject to be treated by J. H. Hale, an authority on peaches. "The Side-Worm Injury" which was prevalent in this section last season, is the subject of Dr. E. P. Felt, the state entomologist, who will use lantern slides; and Dr. Van Slyke, who is conversant with the fertilizer situation created by the war, will give valuable information about available substitutes in his paper on "The War and the Fertilizers of Neutrals."

Demonstration of Pruning

A new feature will be a demonstration of pruning by Herbert P. King, who will prune young peach and apple trees before the audience and give his reasons for what he does. "Practical experience of an Extensive Orchardist" will be the subject of a man new to New York orchardists, J. Andrew Cohill, of Hancock, Md., who is connected with an enterprise that cultivates eight hundred acres of apple trees from which 27,000 barrels were harvested last year. Dr. Reddick and Professor Crosby will conduct a steroptican talk on "Dusting the Apple Orchard."

"The problem of Finding a Profitable Market for the Products of Farms of the State of New York" will be discussed by John J. Dillon. Mr. Dillon is commissioner of the State Department of Foods and Markets, and his talk will be a plain, detailed statement of his work. He will answer the many questions that probably will be asked. "Results of Ten Years of Experimentation with Dwarf Trees" will be thes ubject on which Professor U. P. Hndrick, and Commissioner of Agriculture Charles S. Wilson will speak.

In the round-table series there will be discussion of grapes, other small fruits and garden vegetables. The fruit exhibit is expected to excel all former efforts. The noncompetitive box exhibit alone will occupy a space of nearly three hundred feet, and the plate exhibits will number a thousand.

Cash Prizes Are Offered

In the competitive class these cash prizes are offered: For the best barrel of Greenings, Baldwins and Northern Spies, prizes of $10 and $5; for the best box each of nine specified varieties of apples, $5 and $3 (making nine first and nine seconds); for the largest and best collection of varities, $10 and $5; also cash prizes for smaller collections and for single plates. There also will be cash prizes for displays of pears, grapes, nuts and vegetables, and for parcel post packages while the wives and daughters of members are offered cash premiums for exhibits of canned fruits and jellies.

A sterling silver cup is offered by the International Apple Shippers' Association for the best collection of not less than three barrels of the same or different varieties of apples packed under the New York State packing law. Competition is open to anyone in the state who uses fruit grown in the state.

The secretary-treasurer, John Hall, No. 204 Granite Building, Rochester, will give further information and copies of thep rogram to persons who apply for them.

that its failures have compelled it to utilize such a balance for the purpose of national defense.

It is not fear of the dangers that beset those who are engaged in active service that makes labor fight so hard to retain the voluntary system.

The men in the movement are opposed to compulsion because they are pround to be free, because they realize that compulsory service will jeopardize our industrial and commercial supremacy and further endanger the national credit.

If the young men are taken away from their trade in the concluding years of their apprenticeship, or even where there is no system of apprenticeship, at an age when men are acquiring the necessary refinements of skill, there will be fewer highly skilled artisans.

Labor fears the hold conscription gives over industrial, social and political movements, and it sees the greatest possible danger to the empire itself in the creation of a system which compels a small proportion of the population to serve offensively and defensively in the interests of the whole.

Neither this Givernment nor any other dare consent Ireland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa or even the Crown dependencies.

To force upon England, Scotland and Wales responsibilities entailed by a conscription so limited in character is intolerably unfair, and it will create in the colonies themselves undesirable suspicious as to the motives.

Beyond all this our own fellows, who, if conscripted, will never again be able to stand on equal terms with the voluntarity enlisted colonial troops.

RUSSIANS STAY TEUTON RUSH

London—Russia's campaign in Bessarabia continues to be the most important visible waractivity. From the Pripet to the Roumanian frontier, over a front of at least three hundred miles, a huge Russian force with a great appearance of confidence is hurling sledge hammer blows at the opposing force, which according to all accounts, totals at least a million and a half men.

Petrograd says Russia has had considerable successes in the early stages of the campaign and despatches emphasize the excellent equipment, supplies and munitions which Russia laid up for this purpose during a period of comparative passivity.

The Russians have captured the heights northeast of Czernowitz, Kukowina, according to a despatch to Reuter's Telegram Company from Petrograd. Eight hundred and seventy prisoners fell into the hands of the Russians.

Some London observers, speculating on the meaning of the Bessarabia move, hail it as one of the most ambitious strategic plans since the beginning of hostilities, and predict that it will prove ac olossal attempt to break theb ackbone of the Germanic allies' whole line acoss the Balkans. Thus one critic says:—

"The plan is that Russia and the other allies, moving from different sides, shall meet in the Balkans and gain complete mastery of that peninsula. If they succeed Turkey will be subdued and the vitals of Austria-Hungary menaced."

So lang as Russia keeps up her present activity just north of the Roumanian border the attitude of Roumanian will continue to grow in importance. There have been many assertions in the Entente capitals that Roumania was about to enter the war on the side of the Allies, but nothing to support this has yet been heard from credible Roumanian sources.

Meanwhile, in the south of the Balkan Peninsula, the Allies continue their expectant attitude toward a threatened attack, although Greece seems mainly occupied in making various diplomatic protests, having followed up her polite protest to the Entente Powers against the arrest of the consuls by an equally polite protest to the Central Powers against their aeroplanes flying across Greek territory in a raid which killed a Greek shepherd and a few sheep.

KING PLEDGES NEUTRALITY

London—Martin H. Donohue telegraphs to the Daily Chronicle from Athens an interview with King Constantine, during which the Greek sovereign, after sending fervent greetings to the sovereign people of Great Britain, said:—

"It is true I am brother-in-law of the Kaiser, but I never forget what those who attack me forget. I am a cousin of King George.

"I always like to go straight to the point," said the King. "As a soldier I prefer dealing with soldiers. That is why I was delighted to deal with Lord Kitchener and with General Castelnau. I don't mind being attacked, but I insist on fair play, not suspicions which are worthless and groundless.

"Why should my word be doubted. It has been pledged to a benevolent neutrality. It still holds, and always will hold, good. Neither my opinions nor my pledges have been in any way modified. It said Greece, after the war and the final victory which the Allies look upon as already theirs, will be isolated and sent to Coventry because her present neutrality will have forfeited the friendship of the Entente Powers. I cannot help this. My duty is to my country and that duty unmistakably calls upon me to be neutral.

"Speaking dispassionately, as a soldier, I cannot see that the military results achieved up to the date justify the Ententes' belief in a final crushing victory.

MAGIC OF IRRIGATION.

Story of the Rice Fields of Southern Louisiana.

In 1883 lowlands in southern Louisiana near the bayous suitable for growing sugar cane, corn and cotton could be purchased for $3.50 an acre, and the prairie lands back from the bayous could be bought for $1 an acre. With almost the first crop under irrigation, however, the values showed a marked rise and have continued to increase. In the first five years the value of the best rice lands rose to $10 an acre, and soon after that it rose to $30 and even $50 an acre.

The first people to plant rice in southern Louisiana, according to the United States geological survey, were the Acadians, who, after their expulsion from Nova Scotia by the English in 1755, settled in considerable numbers in Louisiana. Their cultivation of rice, almost primitive in its methods, was confined to the lowlands along the bayous, the prairies affording pasturage for the Acadians' herds of cattle. Few of the lowland areas admitted of satisfactory drainage, and they were too small for profitable cultivation. The crops frequently failed in years of deficient rainfall. Attempts were made to create additional water supplies by building levees across low sags or coulees at points higher than the cultivated areas, but generally either the rainfall proved deficient or the reservoirs were too small.

Little advance was made over the Acadian methods until recent years. Experiments in unusually wet years had shown that the soils of the prairies were adapted to the growth of rice if sufficient water was at hand. This led to the trial of pumps as a means of raising water from the bayous to the rice fields. So successful was the test that pumps were at once installed at many points, and in a few years tens of thousands of acres of previously almost useless land, lying ten to seventy feet above the bayous, were put under cultivation. The first large pump was installed in 1894 on the Bayou Plaquemine, in Acadia parish, near Crowley.

OUR UNRULY SUN.

It Seems to Be Trying to Dilate to the Bursting Point.

The French astronomer Puiseux has been busying himself with the constitution of the sun. He finds that, instead of condensing and shrinking little by little, as was formerly supposed, the sun is constantly dilating more and more and reaching the point of bursting. And if the sun blew up there would be no more need for us poor mortals to worry about worldly affairs.

Big suns every whit as important in their own constellations as ours are frequently victims of an explosion. There was one in the constellation of Perseus early in 1901, and since then two at least have occurred in other celestial groups.

Observation has shown long since that the great orb which is our all in all is a most uncertain character. Sun spots, fire blasts and such like phenomena are by no means the most of which he is capable. The manner in which the sun throws off atomic energy and transforms the heavy into light elements, hydrogen, helium, nebulium, archonium and what not spells nothing good for this world, and a mere nothing might lead to a disaster any day.

In short, it is bound to come at some time or other. Unfortunately science can give us no idea as to when. Centuries and even hundreds of centuries are as but a moment in the history of the universe, says Professor Flammarion, and for all we know the sun may have millions of years more life before it. No man can tell, though, and, just as the strongest of us are struck down in a moment, so the all powerful planet may give out at any time, and when it does it will make but short work of all of us here below.—Boston Transcript.

Argentina's Natural Bridge.

In Argentina there is a natural bridge that is one of the most wonderful in the world. It spans the Rio Mendoza and is known as the Inca bridge. But it is the work of nature, says the Scientific American, and not, as was popularly supposed, of the Incas. The road on which it occurs was probably a colonial highway made by the Peruvian Incas, who took advantage of the phenomenon by leading their road over this natural viaduct.

Origin of Spoons.

Two natural objects seem to have furnished the model for the spoon to primitive man—the river or sea shell and the leaf of plants. In southern China shell spoons are still used that are closely reproduced in the familiar porcelain spoon of that country, while metal spoons are found in India on which are reproduced even the veins of the leaves from which they were copied.

SHORT AND TRAGIC

Career of the First Submarine Used In Real War.

SHE WAS BUILT IN MOBILE.

Constructed of Boiler Iron and Crude In Design, She Was Operated Against the Federal Ship Housatonic With Disastrous Results.

It is a fact that a submersible boat did actual service in the war between the states and was perhaps the first practical submarine used in actual warfare.

The boat was built in Mobile in 1864 by two men named Hundley and McClintock. It was of boiler iron, sharp at both ends and was about thirty feet long, five or six feet in beam and five or six feet deep. It was propelled by a screw, the shaft of which ran horizontally along the hold, almost from stem to stern and was turned by eight men, who sat four on each side of the shaft.

The only hatchway, placed well forward, was two feet in diameter, and it was closed by an iron cap that worked on a hinge and was airtight. In the forward part of the cap there was a clear glass bullseye, through which the pilot could see. The boat had water tight compartments, by filling or emptying which it could sink or rise. A ballast of iron rails was placed outside the hull, and by means of keys they could be detached so that the boat could rise instantly if necessary.

Besides a rudder, the boat had side paddles, or fins, which could be used to guide it up or down through the water.

The boat could go perhaps four knots an hour. It could remain submerged for half an hour or an hour without serious inconvenience to its crew, and once it remained as long as two hours under water without actual injury to them.

A floating torpedo was fastened to the boat by a line 100 feet long, and the inventor proposed that the boat should dive beneath the keel of the enemy's vessel and haul the torpedo after her. The triggers or sensitive primers of the torpedo would press against the ship's bottom, explode the torpedo and sink the vessel.

The boat was sent to Charleston to operate against the blockading fleet. General Beauregard had the torpedo fastened to the bow. It terminated in front with a sharp lance head, so that when the boat was driven against a ship the lance head would be forced into the ship below the water line and the torpedo fastened against the side. The boat was then to back off and explode the torpedo by a lanyard.

General Beauregard called on the Confederate fleet for volunteers, and Lieutenant Payne, a Virginian, and eight sailors volunteered. On the evening fixed for the expedition the crew had embarked, and the boat was submerged until only the combings of her hatch were above water. Lieutenant Payne was standing in the hatchway when the swell of a passing steamer rolled over the boat, and it sank instantly with her eight men. Lieutenant Payne sprang out of the hatchway as the boat sank, and he alone was saved.

In a few days she was raised, and again Payne volunteered and with him eight more men. The embarkation for the second attempt was made at Fort Sumter, and, as before, all being made ready, Payne, standing at his post in the hatchway, gave orders to cast off, when the boat careened and sank instantly. Payne sprang out, two of the men followed him, and the other six went down with the boat and perished.

Again the boat was raised, and her owner, Captain Hundley, took her for an experimental trip to Stone river, where, after going through her usual evolutions, she dived into deep water and disappeared. After a week's search she was found at an angle of fifty degrees, her nose driven into the deep, soft mud of the bottom.

Her crew of nine men were standing, sitting or lying about in her hold, asphyxiated. Hundley had died at his post with a candle in one hand, while with the other he had been vainly trying to unclamp the hatch. The angle at which the boat had gone down had jammed the keys so that the men could not cast off the iron ballast that held them down.

Again the ill fated vessel was prepared for action, and volunteers were called for. Lieutenant Dixon of the Twenty-first Alabama volunteered and eight men with him.

The ship Housatonic was selected for attack and on a quiet night the brave craft set out from Charleston. Lieutenant Dixon guided the boat straight to the Housatonic, and the explosion tore open the ship's side, so that she went down with all her crew in two minutes.

The torpedo vessel never returned, and whether she went down with her enemy or drifted out to sea was long unknown. Many years after, in the work of deepening the bar off Charleston harbor, divers in submarine armor visited the wreck of the Housatonic and found the little torpedo vessel lying by her huge victim, and within her the bones of as devoted and daring men as ever went to sea.

In the history of the submarine certainly the Hundley is entitled to honorable mention.—Youth's Companion.

Peace would be universal if there were neither thine nor mine.—Italian Proverb.

ALDERMEN ORGANIZE AND DESIGNATE CITY'S OFFICIAL NEWSPAPER

Common Council met last night and organized for the year, with the result that Mr. Frank Quirk was unanimously elected as the presiding officer, succeeding Mr. John Distin, who has served in that capacity during the last two years.

Mayor Lewis named the men who are to serve on the six committees, as follows:

Finance, Distin, Quirk and Baker; printing, Quirk, Baker and Distin; claims and grievances, Van Valkenburg, McKay and Malone; office and repairs, Malone, Van Valkenburg, and McKay; property, McKay, Distin and Quirk; ordinances, Baker, Malone and Van Valkenburg.

Dr. N. H. Haviland and Mr. G. B. Clark have received appointment as members of the Board of Health and the Mayor's action was confirmed by the Aldermen.

It will require about $60 worth of postage stamps to mail bills for taxes, and the City Chamberlain received authority to make the purchase.

One of the prerogatives of a mayor of this city is that of appointing Commissioners of Deeds, hence Mayor Lewis caused to be presented to the Aldermen the names of ten persons, as follows: Frank E. Fox, Albert L. Hall, Harriet M. Doane, L. Fowler Joy and Edward Stevens as Commissioners of Deeds. The appointments were confirmed.

Alderman Van Valkenburgh was the only dissenter to the resolution which designated The Fulton Patriot as the official city paper. He voted "No", and his colleagues carried their point. Hereafter the official city newspaper will receive for publication every report of each board and department in the city. This means that instead of the Board of Education receiving free publicity as heretofore, the city will be required to reimburse the official paper for publishing the annual reports of the Board's doings.

"Grievance Day" was established by the Board as January 26, when those who demur at the assessments levied for street sprinkling may have a hearing. The sprinkling tax as assessed amounts to a little over $2,500.

The Board will meet again next Tueday evening, when the matter of providing money to meet interest due on bonds will be taken up.

AMERICANS PROTEST VIOLATION OF RIGHTS; DEPRIVED OF LIBERTY

New York—Four American citizens were unlawfully deprived of their liberty by British officials when the American steamship Kankakee was seized by a British cruiser off Montevideo October 31 last. Two of these citizens are still aboard the Kankakee which, in charge of a British prize crew, has disappeared.

It was learned yesterday that the Kankakee left Montevideo flying the British flag, about November 25, ostensibly bound for England. She has not been heard from since. Efforts of the State Department to locate the vessel have been met with announcement that here whereabouts are unknown.

In taking the ship from Montevideo the British Government violated an agreement made with the United States that the Kankakee would be released on bond, pending a decision of the Prize Court in the cases of the Hocking and the Geiessee.

Alfred Mersburger, chief engineer, and Charles Grecht, first assistant engineer, told the story yesterday, Mersburger, who was born in Germany, became a citizen of the United States five years ago. Grecht was born in Baltimore, Md., thirty-five years ago. The other two Americans still on board are second and third engineers, Boyd and Cleary. Boyd was a school mate of Grecht in Baltimore. Cleary's address is not known.

"We left Norfolk laden with coal about October 4," said Chief Engineer Mersburger. "On October 31, when we were in sight of Montevideo, the British cruiser Macedonia ordered us to come about. A prize crew of ten men, one an officer, and the ## Central Financial Control of State's Affairs to Be Placed in Comptroller's Hands—Superfluous Offices to Be Abolished—Further Recommendations to Be Made By Executive.

Albany, N. Y., Jan. 5.—Governor Whitman's annual message, sent to the legislature today, is as follows:

To the Legislature—The most important recommendations I desire to lay before you at this time are for legislative action that will accomplish the following results:

Provide the inclusion of every necessary expenditure for the conduct of the state government during each fiscal year in a single appropriation act, so framed that it will prescribe clearly and specifically how and for what purpose all state moneys so appropriated shall be used. To assist you in your deliberations I have caused to be prepared a draft of a bill which seems to me to embody the principal features which such an appropriation act should contain.

Place the full control over all authorized expenditures of state moneys where it properly belongs, in the office of the state comptroller.

Change the date of the fiscal year so as to make it begin on the first day of July in each calendar year, instead of on Oct. 1, as at present.

I respectfully recommend to you also the preparation of two proposed amendments to the constitution.

One of these should be designed to provide that the future borrowings of the state be placed upon a modern and sound financial basis, either through the issue of serial bonds or through the application of actuarial methods to the regulation of sinking fund contributions.

With regard to appropriation, the present constitutional provisions seriously interfere with the preparation by the legislature of a state budget in proper form for subsequent consideration by the executive, precluding, among other things, the right of the executive to reduce items and granting only the right to veto. I therefore also recommend the preparation of a constitutional amendment to correct these conditions.

Because of this latter constitutional limitation the budget form of appropriation act which I now suggest depends for its success on the complete co-operation of the legislature and the executive during its preparation, so that those features which require segregation shall before final enactment be acceptable to both the legislature and the governor.

Realizing this, I asked the representatives of the finance committees of the legislature in October last to join with me in a budget conference. This conference has held almost continuous public hearings for two months, and representatives of nearly all the departments of the state government except the legislature, judiciary and elected officers have been called before it.

In addition to working out a budget form for recommendation to the legislature, the conference has arrived at tentative appropriation figures for the departments which have been examined. These figures are in many cases far below the amounts of the desired appropriations for the next fiscal year as filed with the comptroller. In other instances they are substantially below the amounts appropriated for the same purposes by the legislature of 1915. But I am confident that with the further study which the finance committees of the legislature will be able to give to the budget items very large additional reductions will be shown in the final results.

Mohansic State Hospital.

I have included no appropriation either for the Mohansic Hospital For the Insane or the New York State Training School For Boys at Yorktown Heights in the tentative budget proposal, and I recommend that the construction of these institutions be abandoned in view of the opposition of the city of New York toward the continuance of them on the Croton watershed.

Pending a decision on this matter I have ordered work on all contracts in connection with these two institutions stopped.

To meet the problem of relieving the congestion in the insane hospitals in the metropolitan district I recommend the construction of buildings for the care of the aged insane, of which there are a large number in our state hospitals, first at Middletown and elsewhere as the necessity presents itself.

I am assured that accommodations for 2,000 such patients can be provided at Middletown for $700,000. If the existing appropriation for Mohansic of $300,000 is rescinded and an appropriation of the same amount granted to Middletown the construction of buildings of this type can be started without increasing the present obligations of the state. Additional appropriations can be made later to complete the proposed buildings.

I have not included in the tentative budget proposal for Middletown an appropriation for this purpose, as such an allowance must depend upon the policy adopted by the legislature with regard to the Mohansic situation.

When the budget conference was organized I had hoped to include in the recommendations of the tentative appropriation figures the results of the work of the senate civil service committee, which has been making a scientific study of the personal service of the state, with a view to weeding out unnecessary positions, suggesting departmental reorganizations where economies could be effected without injury to the service and placing all state employees upon a basis of compensation which would give the state a fair return for salaries paid.

Unfortunately, the work of the committee had not advanced far enough to justify its members in incorporating their recommendations in specific budget item form. In consequence the budget conference in the tentative budget proposal, in deference to the future recommendations of the civil service committee, has proposed no changes, either of increase or decrease, in the rates of compensation to be paid for the different classes of state service, nor has it proposed reorganizations which, while in many cases apparently necessary, could not be expressed in budget form except after careful and exhaustive study of departmental functions and operation.

The application to the budget by the present legislature of the results of the work of the senate civil service committee along the lines indicated, I believe, will result in very large reductions in the expenses of the state, below the levels indicated by the tentative budget proposals. It is my earnest recommendation that the legislature make this an important part of the budget plan during the present session.

In the department of education, the department of health and in the provisions for the proper housing of the wards of the state in the various hospitals and charitable institutions I have suggested increased allowances, as curtailment of these activities, it seems to me, would not be along the lines of real economy. In the case of the department of education, however, through the co-operation of the commissioner of education the increase for that department has been limited practically to the amount required by law to be added to the fixed annual contributions of the state to the common schools and academies.

In the department of highways the proposed reduction below the level of the appropriations for 1915 is approximately $400,000.

In the department of public works, although the gradual taking over of the new barge canal with its complex and expensive operating machinery necessarily means a larger unit cost in all its activities, the proposed appropriation has been kept below the level of last year on an expenditure basis and more than $550,000 below the appropriations for 1915.

Sinking Funds.

One of the features of the cost of state government which shows an unusually large increase and makes a net saving difficult, even with the exercise of rigid economy in the administrative departments, is the debt service of the state, which includes the payments to the sinking funds and the payment of interest on the outstanding bonds of the state. Those items in the estimate submitted to me by the state comptroller show an increase over the allowances for 1915 of $2,087,465.94, based on the assessed valuation of September, 1915. The final total of the contributions to these sinking funds for the next fiscal year required under the sinking fund provisions of the state constitution must be based upon the assessed valuation of the state as of September, 1916. If these valuations increase during the present year as greatly as they did during the fiscal year ended September, 1915, the estimate of $2,087,465.94 made by the state comptroller in these items will be materially increased.

This increase does not represent an actual need of the state to provide adequately for the amortization of state bonds, but is due to the constitutional provision which fixes the contributions of the state to its sinking funds upon the basis of property values within the state at the time the contribution is made. For this reason our sinking funds are being largely in-

Wednesday, January 5, 1916.

Fear has been expressed by many that after the European war the United States would become the refuge of people who would find that the mother countries had acquired too many restraining influences to make it worth while to remain any longer. We now learn that we are to be in a way protected against this possible influx of perhaps some desirable but surely much undesirable material. In order to discover the probable amount of immigration to be expected after the European war is ended a nation wide canvass will be taken by the chamber of commerce of the United States. The canvass will be made through the railroad ticket agents of the country, who keep close tabs on the immigration situation and would therefore be in a position to know much of value to the investigators. They also are in touch with the steamship ticket agents, who can also give data of value. One of the objects will be to formulate plans to distribute those who are found desirable in order to avoid having them crowd into thickly populated sections. Whether it is found that a large immigration after the war is probable or not, the canvass will evidently yield much valuable information, as the problem of the placing of immigrants under normal conditions has been growing more difficult yearly. The matter of admitting only good assimilating material and barring the undesirable can also be taken under advisement and the necessary precautions taken for the best.

Perhaps most interesting of all "preparedness" documents is the special report of the army war college division of the general staff. It presents most thoroughly the possibility of American disaster through aggressive foreign military activity. The picture that the war college division draws is undeniably alarming. It shows the shores of the United States overrun with hostile soldiers while our own army is being organized. It shows a hostile force of 387,000 men and 81,270 horses with full equipment landing here in fifteen days after the defeat of our navy, with monthly additions of 440,000 men. At this rate the country could be conquered before more than a feeble initial resistance could be made. There is a point which must be calculated on in the figuring—the strength of our navy. All the figures of the war college are based on the foreign foe breaking through our coast defenses. The college will evidently insist on having our strongest barrier in a place where an enemy would be nearly whipped and practically useless if he ever should break through the outer defenses.

PREPAREDNESS, PLEASE

Prosperous times are ahead for Fulton is the universal sentiment found on the streets of our city now-a-days. Everyone is talking about it; the good news is travelling fast.

With the Hunter Arms plant and the Sulphite Mill in action scores of men will be employed regularly. Then at the same time comes the good news of the erection of a large cotton cloth plant at Minetto, which, when completed, will house hundreds of employes. Minetto will not be able to care for her sudden growth and Fulton will undoubtedly be the home of many of these people.

Rumor today had it that the Foster Knife Works has secured some big orders, and that for six months the employes will be worked to capacity that thep roduct may be finished in time. Then to make good the old saying that "It never rains but what it pours," the American Woolen company has raised the wages of its workers to a very noticeable degree.

The Oswego Falls Pulp & Paper company is rapidly completing its enlarged plant, and here again hundreds of extra employes will contribute to the success of the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker, or, in reality the entire Fulton family.

Yes, these are great days. The optimism may be plucked out of the very air as one passes along the street. And as a matter of preparedness Old Mother Fulton must make ready her house. Let her discard at once that worn-out pair of shoes, make clean, be well groomed, put a light in the window, and lend a helping hand to all the members of her big family who are making honest effort for the city's welfare.

Well may it be said, "If things wasn't as they is, how different they'd be."

CO-OPERATE

We must build churches so strong that they can pay a salary sufficient to command an able preacher, and then he can make that an intellectual center that will lead people of capacity and power to stay on the farm, and in rural sections, and build the spirit of co-operation. When we have a little preacher struggling over here, and another one over there, one in a little church here, and another one there, they divide the community and instead of building the spirit of cooperation they make it impossible. Eliminate the small struggling churches and consequently the divisions that arise out of little religious differences that don't amount to the snap of the finger, and build strong, clean, social, intellectual and spiritual centers in a church, commanded by an able man who loves the people, who loves the country, and who can talk in terms of agriculture, and isn't ashamed to do so.—Rev. W. W. Diehl, Hinckley, Illinois.

McKINLEY'S DEFINITION OF A A PROTECTIVE TARIFF

What is a Protective Tariff? Let McKinley, under whose administration prosperity came back to us after our depressing experience with Grover Cleveland and a Democratic Congress, answer the question. His definition is illuminating:

A Protective Tariff is a Tariff upon foreign imports so adjusted as to secure the necessary revenue, and judiciously imposed upon those foreign products the like of which are produced at home, or the like of which we are capable of producing at home. It imposes the duty on the foreign competing product. It makes it bear the burden of duty, and, as far as possible, luxuries only excepted, permits the non-competing foreign product to come in free of duty. Articles of common use, comfort and necessity, which we cannot produce here it sends to the people untaxed and free from custom house exaction. Tea, coffee, spices and drugs are such articles, and under our system are upon the free list. It says to our foreign competitor, if you want to bring your merchandise here, your farm products here, your coal and iron ore, your wool, your salt, your pottery, your glass, your cottons and woolens, and sell alongside of our producers in our markets, we will make your products bear a duty—, in effect, pay for the privilege of doing it. Our kind of Tariff makes the competing foreign article carry theb urden, draw the load, supply the revenue, and in performing this essential office it encourages at the same time our own industries and Protects our own people in their chosen employment. That is the mission of a Protective Tariff.—Rochester (N. Y.) Times.

RUDYARD KIPLING

The fiftieth birthday of Rudyard Kipling fell on December 30th. The reading public is glad that Kipling at 50 is in good health and comfortable circumstances, yet regretful that the flame of his creative genius has died down to a mere spark. One may always hope that the flame will burn brightly again, but the author's devotion to English politics is not encouraging. More true than flippant is the prediction that future critics will say that "Kipling was born a poet and died an Englishman."

In his stories and poems of India is concentrated the real genius of Kipling. He saw India with a comprehending eye—"it came into him life and went out from him truth." He saw the faults and virtues of the British administration; he understood the servile but always aloof Hindus. He had the double gift of clear insight and adequate expression. In one short passage for example, he packs a world of meaning: The Hindu, Grish Chunder, says, "I am afraid to be kicked, but I am not afraid to die, because I know what I know. You are not afraid to be kicked, but you are afraid to die. If you were not, by God! you English would be all over the shop in an hour, upsetting the balances of power and making commotions."

Kipling is above all a lover of strong men. His great aversion is a namby-pamby person, one who is not wise enough to be good and not courageous enough to be bad. If Kipling has a "message" it is to work and play with all the vigor of your heart and mind. In his stories the greatest compliment paid a man is when his superiors mercilessly load him down with work. To struggle and conquer by power of will and force of character, that seems to be Kipling's conception of the highest office of man.

Kipling is not an all-seeing, celestial poet, like Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, George Herbert or Emerson. But he is always wholesome, always urging one to stand firmly on his feet and welcome action in any form. Apparently Kipling is willing to have a man work and love, suffer and sin, if he will only look you in the eye, fearing nothing and asking nothing: "The race is run by one and one, and never by two and two.—Rochester Chronicle-Democrat.

BROWN TURNS TABLES

After being on the defensive for a few weeks, Senator Brown's committee investigating the financial management of New York turned the tables on Mayor Mitchell and exposed the buncombe which the city administration has been giving the people. Senator Brown put it up plainly to the mayor whether he would ask the legislature to accept the views of city officers or the legislators of the city on matters proper for the legislature. He showed that New York mayors had called for the legislation most condemned by Mayor Mitchel and he suggested a referendum which the mayor sidestepped. The senator compelled the mayor to admit it was the banks which made the administration try to get near the pay-as-you-go policy giving out as an achievement of the administration. He made him admit that the budget proclaimed as thel imit of expenditures and showing economy, was a delusion that the board of estimate or the comptroller could issue revenue bonds for millions and expend the receipts for items named in the budget.

On the whole the Wednesday hearing was bad for the Mitchell administration which has thrown dust effectively up to this time, dodging the real situation by stressing what it might do under home rule.

Before Senator Brown gets through with the Mitchel administration he will disclose a waste of money which will startle the taxpayers of the big city. The politicians of the city have capitalized the Republican necessity of levying a direct tax to pay debts incurred by Democrats. They have attempted to divert attention from themselves and so far as the press is concerned they have succeeded. Senator Brown will show that the city pays as much as it costs to conduct the city of Watertown for merely finding out what it is doing. He will show that the cost of carrying the incomplete court house project is greater than the municipal expenditures of Oswego and Auburn combined. Before the committee, finishes, New York will have respect for the state government and its method of conducting public business.—Watertown Standard.

FOR HONEST ADVERTISING

A very significant hearing took place in Washington the other day, when the Associated Advertising clubs of the World argued before the national Trade Commission for government action against fraudulent advertising. The commission was considering whether misleading or otherwise dishonest advertising comes under the jurisdiction of the national trade act. Leading publishers and advertisers were present to express their earnest belief that it does.

The hearing brought out the fact that thirty-two states already have laws that apply to the evil, and that most of them enforce the laws with reasonable stringency. That is a great improvement over the conditions of twenty-five or even ten years ago, but it does not touch the question at issue in the recent hearing; namely how to prevent fraud in national advertising. To prosecute local manufacturers and merchants who make false statements in their advertising is a part of the work of the advertising clubs—is, in fact, one of the things that called them into being in the first place, and that has kept them alive since; but when a man makes an article in one state and advertises it in another, the clubs cannot reach him, nor, in some cases, can the state laws. He is engaged in interstate commerce, over which only the national laws have authority.

Obvious and glaring "fakes" that use the mails the government course can and does stop by issuing fraud orders, which shut off the offenders' postal privileges. Important as that action is,—and the solicitor for the Post Office Department says that by such frands $239,000,000 was lost to the people of the United States in four years,—it stops only a small part of the thefts perpetrated through dishonest advertising. The purpose of the recent hearing was to induce the Trade Commission to act under the present law or to ask Congress for power to act.

Merchants are beginning to see that dishonesty in advertising is unfair competition. The man who tells the truth about his goods is at a disadvantage, as compared with the man who lies cheerfully about his; and certainly it is to the benefit of the community that the honest rather than the dishonest man shall prosper. He deserves the assurance that the strong arm of the government is behind him.—Youth's Companion.

A COSTLY PROPOSAL

The product which the State Tax Commission turns out is taxes, and, like other producers, the more it can turn out, the greater the profit. The profit, however, isn't to the people of the State.

The State Tax Commission has never been known for its economies, and now it proposes to outdo itself. It plans to call all of the assessors in the State, some 3,000, to Albany, to hear a number of speeches, all expenses being paid by the people of the towns. What the expenses will amount to may be imagined when one considers how much it costs to get to and from Albany and how much it requires to live there in hotels. The further away the local assessor happens to live from Albany, the greater the cost. The expenses are to be paid by the district from which the assessor comes.

The excuse for the conference, which is called for January 12 and 13, is that it will secure greater uniformity of assessments. It is conceivable that an assessor would go to the conference and come back home and make his assessments lower, but it is too much for the imagination to expect that he will go back home and raise assessments. The town would not pay his expenses for any such purpose. It is therefore difficult to expect that the conference will contribute much to uniformity.

It is pointed out that it is the duty of the State Tax Commission to send one of its members to each county at least once in every two years, and that it is much cheaper to rest there. Moreover, if the Tax Commission has anything to say to the assessors, it can be said very much more cheaply by the art of printing than by transportating the assessors en masse to Albany to listen to speeches, most of which they couldn't remember and probably would be just as well in not remembering.

The suspicion is also raised that the proposal is another effort on the part of State authorities to interfere with the tax affair of thel ocalities.

Instead of displaying activities in this direction, the commission might profitably look over the allowance, it makes to the mortgage tax collector in each county. Let it figure up the time that the collector in each county clerk's office has to spend on this work and then compare it with the pay the State allows him. We believe that the commission could save quite a number of thousands of dollars in the State in such a work, which would be much more to the advantage of the people than saddling the needless expense of thousands of dollars in conferences of local assessors held at the extreme end of the State.—Utica Observer.

THE CHINESE WAY

Taking a Street Car Ride in the City of Shanghai.

A PUZZLE FOR A WHITE MAN

Experience of an American Tourist Who Made a Bluff at Appearing to Know All the Ropes—A Patient Conductor and an Interested Cargo.

Writing of his adventures in the Chinese city of Shanghai, Homer Croy, in Leslie's Weekly, tells of the experience he had there in taking a ride on a street car:

The car was full of Chinamen, with not another white soul aboard, all sitting there in their skirts, their faces as expressionless as the heads of drums; but as soon as I came in their faces began to fill with interest, one nudging another until the whole car was looking at me.

I felt that something was wrong, but I could not figure out just what. I knew that it shouldn't create that much of a sensation for a white person to get on a car in Shanghai, but still they were looking at me as if I could be signed by a circus. I struggled to look unconcerned, but I knew that my cheeks were backfiring.

The conductor, in his suit of blue jeans, with a satchel over his shoulder, came up and said something to me, while I nodded with earnest carelessness and handed him a twenty-cent piece, knowing that he could get enough out of it to satisfy his wants.

"Mun stau chong du?" he asked.

I nodded again and held out my hand for the change, plainly showing that I made the trip on the line twice a day.

"Mun stau chong du t'aing kaing shon da?" he asked with more feeling, pointing down the street with one hand.

"I didn't catch the drift of his remarks, but I wasn't going to show him that I wasn't an old citizen and taxpayer, so I shook my head this time and nestled back in the seat as if it were all settled. But the conductor became more excited than ever, drafted the other hand and gurgled:

"Mun stau chong du t'aing kaing shon da feah da tsu sz whoo peh quong?"

So I waved in the other direction and tried to nestle again, but the conductor came back with another round of monosyllabic re-enforcements. With that his fellow men in the car came to his help with an artesian of words, each one thinking that he could make it plain by raising his voice just a bit higher than any one else.

Reaching in his satchel, the conductor offered me a slip of paper spoiled with Chinese writing. I took it and started to stuff it nonchalantly into my pocket, but he became more excited than ever and came back with another string of empties, while I put the slip back into his hand as if it made not the slightest bit of difference in the world to me whether I kept it or whether he had it—I would leave the details of the trip to him.

The conductor used his hands some more and then turned and signaled for somebody from the car ahead. Another man in blue jeans with a satchel over his shoulder came and listened for a few blocks while my conductor explained. A Chinaman can never explain anything in a sentence or two; he has to go into details and go through his whole selling talk before he feels that the other has grasped the general drift of thought.

The other man bent over. He was evidently a master of English. "How muchee far you goee, mister? You payee how far you lidee."

Then I understood. When you get on you have to tell the conductor how far you are going, and he charges you for just that distance. But even after my fare was settled the natives on the car kept looking at me and pointing with their chins, as is their custom.

When I went to get off I saw several other white people piling off, but they were all from the front end of the first car. Then I looked at the markings on the car and saw what was the matter—I had been riding in the third class section with the coolies!

All the Shanghai street cars are divided up into classes—first, second and third. The white people all ride first class, the better to do Chinese second, while no one ever ventures third except the coolies.

Nature and Poetry.

Environment aids poetry, but does not create it. Nature is the grand agent in making poetry, and poetry is present wherever nature is. It sparkles on the sea, glows in the rainbow, flashes from the lightning and the star, peals in thunder, roars in the cataract and sings in the winds. Poetry is God's image reflected in nature, as in a mirror, and nature is present wherever man is.—Selected.

His Weak Point.

A man who takes a business view of things when recently asked his opinion of a person of quite a poetic temperament replied:

"Oh, he's one of those men who have soarings after the infinite and divings after the unfathomable, but who never pay cash!"

Something Else.

"Is loving a verb?"

"No; it's just plain nonsense."

Having made this reply to his daughter's question, Mr. Grouch looked a few daggers.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Laughing cheerfulness throws sunlight on all the paths of life.—Richter.

How to be Happy

Happiness is not only a condition of the mind but more often a condition of the body. You may learn something from the experience of Mrs. William Troute, Ilion, N. Y., who was sick for a long time from a badly disordered stomach. "I felt miserable all of the time," she writes. "I was tired and had no appetite. A friend advised me to take Chamberlain's Tablets. I did so and my appetite improved and I gained rapidly in health. Two bottles of them restored me to my former health."

Like Master, Like Man.

In 1814 Baron Stieglitz in St. Petersburg went to great expense to have the news of the treaty of peace conveyed to him by a private courier a few hours before it came to the knowledge of the government. He therefore gained a few hundred thousand rubles. But his porter, to whom he communicated the news, tried his hand at a little speculation of his own. In an hour or two he bought up all the lamps he could find in St. Petersburg, so that in the evening, when the whole city was making ready for the illumination, not a single lamp was to be found in any of the shops. The crafty porter now sold out his stock at a price which left him a nice little profit of 25,000 rubles.

COURT TRYING BLUE FISH CASE

Sandy Creek Man Claims Fish Were Not Yellow But Blue—Many Cases Not Ready.

Oswego—At yesterday's Court session Justice Hubbs dismissed the trial jurors until Monday, as many cases were not ready for trial.

The case of the New York Central vs. George S. Hessler was put over the term.

The case of Gerald B. Owens vs. Falk & Menzies was restored to the calendar.

The trial of the "blue pike" case in Supreme Court ended when the action was submitted to the jury by Justice Hubbs. The State of New York sought to recover $125 in penalties from Perry Bartlett of Sandy Creek on theg round that he caught 11 yellow pike from Lake Ontario out of season. Mr. Bartlett claimed as his defense that the fish were not yellow pike but blue pike, and that there is no law prohibiting the taking of blue pike.

The question finally resolved itself into a matter of expert judgment, with Farrelton H. Bean, fish culturist of the State Conservation Department and world-renowned authority on fish and fish culture, on one side, and Alfred H. Hamilton, handwriting and chemical expert, on the other. Mr. Bean asserted that the fish were undoubtedly yellow pike. Mr. Hamilton was called into the case by John Conboy of Watertown, counsel with Roscoe Sargent of Sandy Creek for the defendant. The expert was here as a witness before the grand jury. He testified that the action of the alcohol in which the fish were preserved would have the effect of turning the fish yellow and the alcohol blue.

In the summing up Mr. Sturges, deputy attorney general said, that one of the witnesses testified that he knew the fish seized were blue pike by their feet. The defense did not object to the statement but it was said that the attorney was mistaken as there is no such evidence.

Cases Were Not Ready

With the closing of the fish case, Justice Hubbs found that none of the cases on the day calendar were ready for trial. No. 79 was reported as settled. The case was that of Martha E. Hunter vs. John J. Hart and J. W. Hart and was an action on a promissorp note.

The following cases were dismissed the plaintiff failing to appear:

Charles L. Eline vs. Benjamin W. Caswell, sued as Bernard W. Caswell. Charles L. Eline vs. Sarah Larabee. Both actions are for the recovery of damages for breach of contract.

County Judge H. D. Coville, acting for Miss Julia R. Jenney of Syracuse, attorney for the plaintiff in the action of John W. Dygert vs. William S. Blake, moved to put the case at the head of the day calendar for Monday next. The action for alleged negligence, involving the killing of a horse by an Empire United trolley car. The plaintiff claims that the horse was not as represented by the defendant when sold.

A motion will be made to put the case of James A. Clark vs David Levi and Camillo Grassi over the term. The cause of action is assault and damages are asked.

The case of Howard Hayes vs. Thomas Lacy, an action to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution, is the next on the calendar.

The jury in the first case returned a verdict for $25 but Justice Hubbs said that they must have misunderstood his charge. After further consideration the jury returned a verdict for $35.

Mr. Sturges objected to the verdict on the ground that it was not sufficient. Justice Hubbs directed the attorney to file briefs within three weeks.

LUNGS OF A BATTLESHIP.

Ventilation Is a Serious Problem in Building War Vessels.

One of the most difficult problems in building a battleship is to secure satisfactory ventilation. She is a very complicated creature, made up of so many steel boxes, large and small, for the accommodation of officers, men, coal, ammunition and stores, dotted here and there with so many steel ladders, automatic lifts, steel bulkheads and water tight doors, varied here and there by miles of electric wires belonging to lights, telephones, bells and motors, to say nothing of the endless mileage of pipes for flooding, draining, pumping, fresh water, fresh air or compressed air and speaking tubes.

First in importance comes the ventilating of the boiler and engine rooms. When you begin to think of gangs of coal black demons working away in the bowels of the ship at a temperature of 120 degrees; when, too, you commence to realize that unless the furnaces receive their required draft the speed of the battleship drops to below that of her sisters in the squadron, you appreciate the importance of the steam driven fans to the furnaces and boiler rooms. The supply of air comes down through large water tight trunks, which are continued right up to the weather deck, armored gratings being provided at the protective deck.

For ventilating engine rooms large electric fans are employed. So, too, the coal bunkers have to be ventilated, owing to the gas which the coal gives off. This gas when mixed with air forms an explosive, so in order to prevent the possibility of injury to men or ship supply and exhaust pipes are fitted in such a manner as to cause a current of air.—Pearson's Weekly.

Only Nation Without Budget.

We are the only civilized nation that hasn't a budget system. France, Germany, Russia, Japan, England, Italy, Spain, Rumania, Servia, Portugal, Bulgaria and Venezuela—all these countries and many more have budgets. In each country, that is, certain responsible officers prepare a definite plan for doing things, estimate the cost of executing it and suggest means for raising the money. There is only one important nation that has no business plan, and that is the one that has chiefly distinguished itself as a nation of business men—the United States.—World's Work.

"Old Man" With Four Legs Fashioned by Prisoner.

QUIETLY RIPS SAFE KNOB.

Marks Found After Robbery In Michigan Trust Company at Grand Rapids Spoke Volumes to Detectives—Weighs Less Than Ten Pounds, but Does Job. Sometimes "Soup" Is Needed.

Grand Rapids, Mich.—A few years ago a mechanician fashioned a few strips of steel at his home forge, and the grotesque creation of this man, who is now serving time in the Ohio penitentiary, was christened "old man," and by way of distinction he was spoken of as having four legs.

When top story men worked in the Michigan Trust building here on a recent Sunday and tore out the combinations of two safes and shot another with nitroglycerin the "old man" with the four legs left his imprints on the safes. Where his "feet" had been planted were four deep dents. Those marks spoke volumes to the detectives.

Only expert safe crackers use the "old man." The man whose brain gave birth to this ingenious tool fashioned a most powerful and useful implement for the craft who use explosives and drill steel safes for a living when some commonwealth is not feeding and housing them in exchange for a safe cracking job or some other depredation.

A piece of steel fashioned into the semblance of a narrow horseshoe is the framework of the "old man." There is just enough room between these strips to enable the "old man" to drop over the knob of a safe. Four holes drilled in the "old man's" frame furnish the foothold for the four legs. The holes are threaded with a fine thread, as are the legs.

Once the "old man" fastens his grip upon the safe knob the legs are screwed into the holes. The close threads on bolts and hole give the "old man" a tremendous purchase power, and with a monkey wrench the legs are screwed down.

In a moment they are fast and the "old man's" back is bent to the task. So short and powerful is his frame and so closely set are his legs that there is no chance for him to bend at his work. The combination commences to give, and as the jaws of the wrench twist the legs in deeper the knob is slowly torn out. Entrance to the safe then is easy, and the inner compartments, once bared, are easily battered in.

The "old man's" right hand aid is a self-fed drill, which can be fastened into the "old man's" frame as easily as one of the legs. An extra hole is drilled into the frame, and into this fits the threaded bolt that holds the drill steady and in place. But the drill is used only where the charge of "soup," or nitroglycerin, is resorted to in blowing the safe.

In this case the yeggs fasten the "old man" securely on the safe knob. The drill is placed, and the yegg then feeds the steel drill as he turns the handle. The bolt which holds the drill to its work and which is fastened into the "old man's" frame is one piece, while the drill is set inside of a threaded bolt that pushes it forward with the regularity the yegg uses in drilling.

After the hole is deep enough the "soup" is administered, and the hole is covered with wax and a fuse attached. Office rugs are thrown over the safe, and the yeggs step to one side as the fuse is fired. The real yegg uses just enough "soup" to accomplish the work of wrecking the safe without blowing the doors through a wall or making unnecessary noise.

The last job done in which the "old man" and a charge of "soup" were used was sufficient just to pull the door from its steel fastenings and hurl the combination out. Pushing back the bolts was nothing, and with a kit of special tools the yeggs soon entered the strong box.

The latest jobs credited to the "old man" with the four legs are those at Flint, in which much loot was taken from a bank; the Vermontville postoffice and the United Light and Railways company's offices here, in which the "old man" was clamped on three safes.

One of the most complete yegg outfits in captivity is in possession of Director of Safety A. A. Carroll, who has the "old man" with the four legs. Included in this outfit are drills of various sizes, threading tools, skeleton key, "soup" guns, wax, chisels and sundry articles. The outfit was taken from a pair of yeggs who were captured by Director Carroll, but who fled after they jumped their bail bonds.

So complete was the tool molded by the inventor of the "old man" that the police assert no added inventions have come to make such an instrument more useful.

NEW YORK TO HAVE PRISON EXHIBIT

A remarkable Prison Exhibit will open in New York City, at the Russell Sage Foundation Building, under the auspices of the Joint Committee on Prison Reform, on January 10th, 1916. Months have been spent in preparation for this exhibition, which will include not only an up-to-date campaign on the proposition that Sing Sing Must Go, but also booths describing conditions in County Jails and other correctional institutions. Special attention is also given to the indeterminate sentence, probation, parole, women delinquents, tramps and vagrants, the feeble minded, and prison labor.

An additional and exclusive feature of the Prison Exhibit will be the striking motion pictures taken during the last fall at Sing Sing, Auburn and Great Meadow Prisons by the Joint Committee. Several thousand feet of film have been taken, showing not only the fearfully antiquated and congested conditions of the old prisons, but also the very modern surroundings of the newest New York Prison, Great Meadow. In addition, the newest methods in prison reform will be illustrated by the films.

Later in the winter the Prison Exhibit will be brought to Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse and Albany. Strong committees in those cities already have the local programs under way. In both New York City and in up-State cities prominent speakers will hold daily conferences.

The Exhibit is not carping; or destructive in tone, but constructive and hopeful. It aims to present an all-around picture of conditions. The Joint Committee on Prison Reform numbers among its members Miss Anne Morgan, Mrs. August Belmont, Thomas Mott Osborne, Richard M. Hurd, Harry B. Winters and Mrs. Francis McNiel Bacon, Chairman.

(Oswego Times)

The first annual meeting of the Oswego County Co-operative Association will be held at the Common Council room in the City Hall on Saturday morning at 9 o'clock. There will be an election of officers and among the other matters to come up will be the advisability of employing a competent manager to look after the affairs of the association, establishment of cold storage or some other packing house, standardizing of association packages and labelling, as is done in the west; making it compulsory for growers to grade and sort their own fruit at home; a time limit for members signing up with the association during that season, and establishing of rules and regulations for packing houseg overnment.

While the members are present the purchasing department will endeavor to secure an estimate of the number of fruit trees desired, garden seeds, ground limestone, draining tile, fertilizer, paint and other material. Considerable interest will be displayed in the fertilizer question as on account of the war the supply of potash is cut off. Means of offsetting this will be discussed and a general discussion will take place. Indications point to a large attendance.

MESSAGE OF GOV. WHITMAN

flated, and the taxpayers of the present are called upon to make contributions for this purpose which properly should fall upon the taxpayers of the future.

I earnestly recommend that a constitutional amendment be prepared by the present legislature to correct this condition as far as it is possible and to provide that the future borrowing of the state be placed upon a modern and sound financial basis, either through the use of serial bonds or through the application of actuarial methods to the regulation of sinking fund contributions.

Central Financial Control.

Before calling to your attention more specifically what I regard as the important features of the proposed state budget form which I have prepared for your consideration I would refer to those features of state financial methods which I believe should be simplified and to my reasons for urging that full control of all authorized expenditures of state moneys be placed where it properly belongs, in the office of the state comptroller.

If it is agreed that these conditions should be corrected, then the proposed form of budget, with its necessary terms and conditions, is, I believe, the most practical instrument for accomplishing that end.

There are now some sixty-five officers of the state and of its counties who encroach upon the proper functions of the state comptroller and treasurer and share with them the control over the expenditures of state moneys. A system which permits such a condition is contrary to the best practices of governmental finances.

The highway department of the state is its own financial officer for the expenditure through fifty-seven county treasurers of the entire state appropriation for the maintenance of state and county highways. Under this plan state moneys in large amounts lie unexpended in the custody of the county treasurers for a year or two years at a time. The appropriations for these purposes by the legislature of 1915 amounted to slightly less than $4,000,000. The proposed appropriations for next year for the same purpose total about $3,600,000. I believe that no department should audit and pay claims resulting from its own operation.

The department of public works is likewise its own financial officer for its financial operations. The maintenance appropriations of this department for the year 1915 aggregated $1,924,000.

The state hospital commission is the financial officer of the state for fourteen insane asylums, expending approximately $8,000,000 annually in maintenance and construction.

The fiscal supervisor is the financial officer of the state for the nineteen state charitable institutions, expending over $3,000,000 annually.

The prison department is the financial officer of the state for the six prisons and two hospitals for the criminal insane, the expenditures of which aggregate over $1,000,000 annually.

The state armory commission, without any act of the legislature, assesses upon the counties the amount necessary for the maintenance of county armories, and the only legislative control over the operation is the appropriation of moneys so collected for the purposes of their collection. This appropriation is in excess of $680,000 annually.

The Palisades Interstate park commission is its own financial officer in its use of state moneys either through direct appropriation or bond issue.

The state fair commission under the present law makes disbursements without legislative appropriation of a large percentage of the gate and other receipts of the fair.

The above are the chief examples of existing decentralization of state financial control.

Fund Division.

Another confusing and objectionable feature of state finance which, like the segregation of financial control, results in duplication of work, added office expense and divided responsibility is the existence of funds separate from the general fund of the state and the commitment of certain revenues of the state to specific classes of expenditure. An example of the first type is the canal maintenance fund and of the second the fund from automobile and chauffeurs' license fee collections. This latter is reserved to be expended upon the maintenance of highways. I believe that appropriations for any state activity should be based upon the proper allowance for that activity and not upon the accident of any form of specific revenue collection.

My recommendations to the legislature in connection with these features of financial administration are as follows:

That hereafter the funds of the state except trust or sinking funds or other funds provided for by the constitution, should be of three kinds only:

First.—Funds from the proceeds of the sale of state bonds for construction or permanent improvements.

Second.—Funds from the proceeds of the sale of manufactured or farm products or the other results of labor of inmates of state institutions.

Third.—The general fund shall be made up of the proceeds of direct or indirect taxation, from the sale of public property, from the receipt of fines, fees, licenses, sales or privileges, the collection of penalties, payments of admission to a fair or exhibit conducted by the state, payments for medical or surgical or hospital treatment or care and all other receipts not in the previous classifications.

This means that no receipts of the state shall hereafter be reserved for specific purposes except where so provided in the constitution. This recommendation would include the abolishment of the canal maintenance fund, the highway maintenance fund from automobile taxes and the fund from collections made by hospitals or institutions for the care of pay inmates.

I would further recommend the establishment of the principle that no payment be made out of the fund derived from inmate industry or from the general fund except after specific legislative appropriation, except that the legislature may permit, in the case of the prison capital fund or in any hospital where an industry is conducted, the establishment of a permanent fund to provide necessary working capital for the purchase of material, which capital may be replenished by the comptroller from revenues from industry without an appropriation only to the extent of the original legislative allotment.

That in no case should any moneys be paid hereafter into the hands of any representative of a department or institution or any county, town or city officer, except upon the certificate of the comptroller that the money is due either in full from the state or is a legal share of the state in the case of services rendered (including salaries and wages) or work done or supplies and materials furnished, except that the legislature may permit the state comptroller to transfer small amounts of money to departments or state institutions to meet petty cash disbursements, which shall be accounted for before the next allotment is received. Petty cash allowances to institutions and departments shall be sufficient to meet the anticipated expenditures for three months for postage, expressage and statutory payments for contributions to and transportation for prisoners.

This means that a deposit with county treasurers of county allotments of state highway maintenance shall cease; also payments to the superintendent of public works for expenses of his department; also the payments to hospitals and institutions of any amounts whatever other than the petty cash fund proposal referred to.

That all of the fiscal powers now segregated among the various state departments shall be centered in the office of the state comptroller. This will mean a removal of these financial powers from the department of highways, department of public works, the hospital commission, the fiscal supervisor, the prison department, the armory commission, the Palisades park commission and the state fair commission.

Fiscal Supervisor.

I recommend that the office of the fiscal supervisor be abolished.

I recommend that the office of the state comptroller shall immediately be so organized that these proposals may be carried on without delay.

Port Wardens.

I recommend that the office of the board of port wardens of the port of New York be abolished as not representing a proper state function as soon as arrangements can be made for the carrying on of these duties by the federal government.

Health Officer.

I recommend for the same reason that the office of the health officer of the port of New York be abolished as soon as arrangements can be made for the carrying on of these duties by the federal government.

Nautical School.

I recommend that the New York State Nautical school be abolished in the interest of economy and in view of other and more pressing educational needs of the state. Under the circumstances it does not appear to be good public policy to feed, clothe and maintain pupils of this school at an annual cost of $100,000 for approximately a hundred pupils.

I recommend further that the training ship Newport be returned to the federal government.

Budget Recommendations.

My recommendations to the legislature with regard to the state budget are as follows:

That the fiscal year of the state shall begin on July 1 and end on June 30 following. My reason for this recommendation is to bring the period for the use of state appropriations as close as possible to the time within which the appropriations are considered by the legislature. The change in the fiscal year from Oct. 1 to July 1 will reduce that interval by three months and should practically eliminate both the necessity and the excuse for special and supply bills, which constitute the most objectionable features of the present legislative budget plan.

That all appropriations or reappropriations for a fiscal year shall be in one appropriation act except for an extraordinary emergency occurring during a legislative session or to meet the expense of a new department of state government created after the adoption of the regular budget appropriations.

An important result of the adoption of this recommendation will be that a proper proportion or balance will be reached and maintained among the various state activities, so that no one of them must be sacrificed or suffer through an overappropriation for another, under special enactments. The plan offers not only to the legislature, but to the public, a complete and directly informative presentation of all the financial needs of the state.

That all appropriations other than those made for specifically described repairs for construction and permanent betterments or for payment of sinking fund or interest charges or for the payment of adjudicated claims against the state shall lapse at the end of the fiscal year of which the appropriation is made.

That all appropriations shall be made so as to clearly and specifically prescribe how all state moneys are to be used.

That all appropriations for any one department or activity shall be expressed in items closely associated, so that knowledge of the total expenditures for each group or activity, instead of being scattered in a number of bills passed at intervals during a session, are made the subject of one legislative consideration.

That appropriations for all expenses of the state for personal service, including regular and temporary salaries and regular and temporary wages, shall be subject to schedules of personal service in which salaries of regular employees, salaries of temporary employees, the wages of regular employees and the wages of temporary employees are segregated.

That appropriations for the expenses of maintenance other than personal service of departments or state activities shall be made subject to schedules classified according to kinds of expense and, when required, apportioning these classifications to the activities or subactivities for which they are established.

In the tentative budget proposal the proposed appropriations are shown under the expense classifications adopted by the conference at the beginning of its work. The effect of these classifications, applied to the appropriations of the entire state, will be to require that similar appropriations in the various departments must be used for similar classes of expense, no matter for what department the appropriation is made. This will result in the enforcement of a proper balance between expense appropriations, not allowing in a department an excessive use of moneys for one purpose of administration at the sacrifice of proper expenditures for other purposes.

Where an appropriation is necessary for a specific work or object, which work or object is not to be accomplished by the use of schedulized departmental labor, the budget proposal contemplates a specific appropriation in accordance with the already established state practice.

The appropriation form of the budget proposal falls, therefore, into three classifications:

First.—For personal service with schedules.

Second.—For classified expense other than personal service, with schedules, and.

Third.—Appropriations for specific objects, including repair, construction or permanent improvement items.

It is in the preparation of these supporting schedules of appropriations that co-operation before final enactment between the legislature and the executive will be necessary, so that the total of the appropriation and the total of the schedules shall agree. Otherwise, to give the executive the opportunity to veto individual items of expense, it will be necessary for the legislature to make a separate appropriation for each of the items entering into these schedules.

In order to provide elasticity in the operation of these schedules it is proposed that modifications shall be permitted by executive order upon request of the departments for which the appropriations are made.

The only limitations proposed are, first, that there shall be no transfer between schedules for personal service and schedules for other than personal service, and that no transfers for temporary service or wages to other than temporary service or wages or from wages to salaries within a schedule for personal service be permitted, and that no modification of the personal service schedules shall be allowed which will increase the annual rate of personal service cost above the level of expense fixed by the original act of appropriation or which shall increase the annual rate of compensation of the head of a department, board, office or commission or the deputies thereof.

By the same use of the executive order, on request of the departments, transfers between scheduled items supporting appropriations for other than personal service will be permitted. The benefits which will be derived from this form of state appropriation are so obvious and so numerous that I need not go into detail concerning them in this message.

One of the most important features to which I may refer, however, is that through this form of enactment the legislature may express its administrative policy in the terms of exact appropriation. The terms and conditions attached to the budget may be used after appropriation to enforce administrative control and to compel economies impossible in the nonschedulized or partially schedulized budget plan. All the salaries and wages to be paid by the state are shown against the title of the various positions in the activities to which they are assigned.

If the working force in any department or division is too large this form of segregation permits a correction of that condition. Other classes of expenses are also subdivided in such a manner that the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the allowances can be readily discerned.

Most important perhaps of all is the fact that only through this or a similar form of schedulized and classified budget appropriation can the state comptroller accomplish the supervision over the expenditures of the state which properly belongs to his function.

I therefore transmit herewith and as a part of this message for your consideration a suggested form of appropriation bill, together with the estimates on which the same is based.

The tentative budget proposals, schedule lines and totals for the legislature, the courts and the departments of the elective officers of the state are in the same amounts and for the same objects as indicated either in the desired appropriations submitted to the comptroller or in the revised requests submitted to the conference. They have not been revised and are included herein subject to future review.

The Scrap Book

Not Wholly Unselfish.

Way back in the sixties the famous poet, editor and story teller, Thomas Bailey Aldrich, was then simple "Tom" Aldrich. He was a clerk on a small salary in George W. Carleton's book store, at Broadway and Lispenard street, in New York. He was then but eighteen and had just started the lines of "Babie Bell:"

Have you not heard the poets tell
How came the dainty Babie Bell
Into this world of ours?

which afterward resulted in marking the beginning of his career.

Fitz James O'Brien was accustomed to drop into the store, and between him and young Aldrich a friendship sprang up. On one occasion when O'Brien came in even more unsteady in his gait than was his usual custom, Aldrich made up his mind to take him over to a hotel across the street and put the erratic poet to bed. While he was leading O'Brien carefully across the street some friend met them and said to Aldrich:

"Why do you bother with the man? Let him go."

"Not much I won't," replied Aldrich. "He borrowed a dollar from me two days ago, and I can't afford to let anything happen to him."

If I Knew.

If I knew that a word of mine,
A word not kind and true,
Might leave its trace on a loved one's face
I'd never speak harshly, would you?

If I knew that the light of a smile
Might linger the whole day through
And brighten some heart with a heavier part
I wouldn't withhold it, would you?

A Matter of Arrangement.

A man was brought before a police court charged with abusing his team and using loud and profane language on the street. One of the witnesses was a pious old darky, who was submitted to a short cross examination.

"Did the defendant use improper language while he was beating his horses?" asked the lawyer.

"Well, he talk mighty loud, suh."

"Did he indulge in profaulty?"

The witness seemed puzzled. The lawyer put the question in another form:

"What I mean, Uncle Aus, is did he use words that would be proper for your minister to use in a sermon?"

"Oh, yes, suh; yes, suh," the old man replied, with a grin that revealed the full width of his immense mouth, "but dey'd have to be 'ranged diff'runt."—Everybody's.

A Cure That Failed.

"When I was a youngster," said an old man, "I was poisoned by an ivy vine. My nose got very red and swelled up twice its natural size. The infection spread to my cheeks, and they were all covered with blotches.

"I was told to use buttermilk. I bought a gallon and drank it. I bought another gallon the next day and got outside of that. In fact, I drank so much buttermilk that the price went up about 15 cents a gallon in that community within a very few days. But the poisoning was not getting any better. It was not improving one bit, and I couldn't understand it.

"I told the people who had recommended the buttermilk that it was not helping me. 'Why, I bet I have swallowed a barrel of buttermilk within the past week,' I told them.

"'You drank it?' they shouted back at me.

"'Of course,' I replied. 'What did you expect to me to do with it?'

"'Why, we meant for you to bathe your face with buttermilk, not drink it,' was the answer.

"I pretty nearly collapsed. To this day I can't look buttermilk in the face."

That Was All.

A man was walking along the street, and he saw a house on fire. He rushed across the way and rang the bell. After some time a lady, who proved to be slightly deaf, appeared at the door.

"Madam, your house is on fire." "What did you say?" The man began dancing up and down. He pointed above. "I said your house is afire! Flames bursting out! No time to lose!" "What did you say?" "House afire! Quick!" The lady smiled. "Is that all?" she said sweetly. "Well," replied the man hopelessly, "that's all I can think of just now."

BLACK BIRCH TREES.

The Source From Which We Get That Wintergreen Flavor.

Chewing gum and candy eaters would miss this tree if it ever happened to disappear. It furnishes "that wintergreen flavor." Besides a flavoring for candy, it is used by chemists to hide certain nasty tastes in medicines they give to children.

From the sap of the tree is brewed the drink called birch beer; so, you see, this tree is a confection shop in itself and deserves a place in that fairyland forest with the sugar plum tree and the others. Its name is black birch.

It has another name, cherry birch, named thus because the smooth bark looks like the bark of the cherry tree. It is dark brown in color and comes off in layers. Beneath this layer is the inner bark, which contains the flavor.

An old black birch tree has a rough bark covering its trunk, but the smooth bark always covers the limbs. If you want to be sure of its identity break off a twig and chew it. You'll never mistake the flavor.

Even the leaves, which are ovate and have prominent veins, bear a spicy flavor. Early in the spring, before the leaves appear, the tree is covered with yellowish catkins. About June the fruit appears in the shape of cones. When these cones are ripe they separate into tiny nuts with narrow wings and scatter to the four winds.

Birch distilleries are still more or less common in mountain regions where the tree is plentiful. The wintergreen oil obtained from the bark is valuable. The wood is hard and is sometimes used for furniture.—Philadelphia North American.

AUTOISTS PAY HEAVY SUMS

Little Short of Two Million Dollars Received, Reports Secretary Hugo—Increase Over 1914.

Albany—Eleven months of automobile registration in this State ending December 31 have brought receipts amounting to $1,905,153 to the office of Secretary of State Hugo, as compared with $1,618,060.36 for 12 months in 1914. With one month's receipts still to come in the auto year, the total will amount to several thousand dollars more, but will be under the two billion mark, which at one time during the summer's rush seemed possible. December's receipts footed to $17,391.58, and do not include any of the 1916 business. Up to January 1st of this year exactly 233,325 automobiles have been registered in the state by owners and dealers; 231,126 by the former and 2,199 by the latter. During thes ame monts in 1914, a total of 169,966 cars were registered, or 61,160 less than this year; dealers numbering 1,743 and owners 168,223.

Few persons realize the number of license plates lost from cars during the year. From the New York City district 1,576 plates have been reported as lost or stolen during the eleven months of 1915; 605 from Buffalo and 404 from Albany; a total of 2,585.

The following shows the registration of cars in this State up to January 1, 1916, with the number of owners, dealers, chauffeurs and total receipts from all sources for each of the three districts:

New York, owners, 101,074; dealers, 724; chauffeurs, 55,222; receipts, $921,817.

Buffalo, owners, 72,815; dealers, 750; chauffeurs, 13,086; receipts, $548,565.50.

Albany, owners, 57,237; dealers, 725; chauffeurs, 12,958; receipts, $434,770.50.

Towards the total amount, owners, chauffeurs and dealers have paid in registration fees the following:

New York, owners, $38,112.50; chauffeurs, $149,084; dealers, $15,448.

Buffalo, owners, $184,267.50; chauffeurs, $41,483; dealers, $16,371.

Albany, owners, $374,332.50; chauffeurs, $40,235; dealers, $14,782.

STEAMER'S DEAD NUMBER 222

London—A press telegram from Cairo reports that only twelve out of eighty saloon passengers on board the Persia were saved. The Peninsular and Oriental Company now estimates the loss of life to total 222. The name of Robert New McNeely, American Consul at Aden, is not on the official list of the survivors received by the Admiralty.

Other prominent men and women who perished as the result of this lastest massacre include Colonel E. R. Swiney, Lieutenant Colonel Howell, Lieutenant Colonel Nethersole, Captain J. T. Lodwick, Lieutenant V. Gough, the Rev. A. C. Grant, pastor of the Anglican Church at Bombay; Mrs. H. DeB. Coddington, wife of Lieutenant Colonel Coddington; Mrs. H. T. Tresham, who was the daughter of Major Burch, of Leytonstone, and F. M. Coleman, one of the proprietors of the Times of India, Bombay.

Captain W. S. Hall of the Persia, was drowned. He went down with his ship. As the Persia sank four minutes after being torpedoed it was seemingly a miracle that any one was saved. The survivors among the passengers include fifteen women out of eighty-six, ten military officers and eight foreigners. All of the thirty-five children aboard seem to have perished.

The submarine is now believed to have been Austrian.

The Peninsular and Oriental Steam ship company issued a statement yesterday to the effect that the steamship Geelong was sunk in a collision with the steamship Bonvilston.

Sinking of the Geelong was reported on Monday night without mention being made of the cause of her loss. No lives were lost when she went down.

ANOTHER KLEINE DRAMA AT THE QUIRK TODAY

There is nothing of the "nimby namby" or "wishy washy" girl about Amy Cary as portrayed by "Irene eFnwick" in "The Sentimental Lady" to be shown as the leading feature at The Quirk Thaetre today.

On the contrary, Miss Cary is the ideal, up-to-the-minute American girl who, when occasion requires, can storm like thew inds off Cape Hatteras, scintillate with killing scorn, and voice indignation in unmistable terms. She is a real girl and shows it when she discovers that she is marooned on an island with a man who took her for a boat ride—but through no intentional act of his. But they are marooned sure enough, and it is this part of a well laid plot that leads up to a climax worthy of Miss Fenwick's best efforts.

Her companion, Bob Nelson, a young attorney, bent only on averting threatened financial disaster, but hoping also to avert a matrimonial tragedy, both overshadowing the heroine is "hard put" when the girl he wants to protect turns on him, but he weathers the storm successfully and caps the climax by winning her affection when he makes a daring, dangerous swim, proving to her that he held her interests paramount to all others—especially his own. His daring and heroism quickly transforms Amy Cary into "The Sentimental Lady", and Cupid comes into his own.

This masterpiece of filf production is a Kleine drama, written by Owen Davis and released through the Kleine-Edison Feature Service.

others soldiers, armed with rifles and revolvers, took charge of the ship.

"We were taken to the English Bank, a shoal one hundred miles out of Montevideo, and anchored. The prize officers refused to answer any questions. Captain Ludwig Thorsen first made a verbal protest and later two more in writing, which all of the Kankakee's officers signed. No attention was paid to them.

President Wagner said last night: "There are 4,000 tons of coal on board the Kankakee consigned to an American firm in Montevideo. This cargo Great Britain seems to have carried off. Of course, I am notifying Washington."

AN OCEAN TRAGEDY

The Wreck of the White Ship Nearly Eight Centuries Ago.

FATE OF AN HEIR TO A CROWN.

From a Scene of Wild Revelry on Board the Doomed Vessel Prince William of England Went to Death Trying to Save His Sister.

Nearly eight centuries ago there occurred an English shipwreck that may be ranked in importance historically with any tragedy of the sea that the world has ever known. Although in comparison with some shipwrecks the loss of life was small—scarcely a handful—when the White Ship foundered in November, 1120, she carried the heir to the throne of England to his grave in the depths. There was no wireless then to hear her call for help, although her companions of the king's fleet were so near that tradition says the nearest caught a faint, shrill wind borne cry, a shriek a little different than that of the shrieking gulls—the dying cry of the White Ship's company. No one guessed what it meant, nor did any ship turn from her course.

Prince William, son of Henry I., a Norman king, and of his queen, Edith, or Matilda, an English princess, held a position of especial importance and influence, for he represented the union in the royal line of the two races. The old title of the Saxon kings had been revived for him. He was called William the Atheling. Although only a boy of eighteen, he had been recently married to the French princess Matilda, to whom he had been betrothed since he was ten and she a baby. In France, too, he had shared with his father the honors of battle against the rebellious Norman nobles and had shown himself a courageous and chivalrous opponent. After victory was attained King Henry, William the Atheling and the leaders of the campaign set sail from Harfleur for England.

The White Ship had been built as a gift for the king, but he did not wish to disappoint the captain of another vessel, to whom he had promised the honor of his presence, and therefore he asked that it be offered to Prince William instead. All the other ships had got away before the White Ship with the prince, his half brother, Richard; his half sister, the Countess of Perche, and a brilliant company weighed anchor. She was under the command of Thomas Fitzstephen, an experienced sea captain, who himself took the helm.

The night was bright and clear; there was a moon. The prince, as gay, wild and lawless as he was brave, called for wine and music. Nobles and ladies danced on the scarcely heaving deck. They drank often; the captain and sailors oftener. They were only a little way on their journey when the ship ran full upon a rocky reef, well known and charted, that rent her like a knife.

The shock sobered Fitzstephen. He seized Prince William, rushed him to a boat, sprang in himself, with a few sailors, and pushed off. They were several boat lengths distant and safe when the prince's sister shrieked to him from the slanting deck to save her. He ordered the boat back, despite the protests of Fitzstephen, who foresaw what would happen. As they neared the heeling wreck and the prince held out his arms his sister leaped—but not she alone. Under the scrambling, leaping, frantic crowd that dropped into the small boat it swamped, and all were drowned.

Only one man of all those on the White Ship survived, and he was a poor butcher of Rouen, a strong swimmer, who floated on a spar until a fisherman rescued him. He brought the news to England and to the court. Then for a whole day the courtiers, although many of them were themselves mourners for the lost, kept it from the king. No one dared to tell him. At last they found an envoy whom he could neither hate nor punish as a messenger of evil tidings. That was a young page, son of the Count of Blois and King Henry's own grandnephew. The lad, dressed in deep mourning, knelt silently at the king's feet, weeping, until the king, seeing his pale face and his tears, half guessed the news. Then the boy faltered out the story. King Henry fell senseless when it was ended.

So great was the blow to his affection and ambition that tradition declares that he never smiled again, a tradition embodied in some once well known verses by Felicia Hemans. A greater poet, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, in his fine and true ballad, "The White Ship," has told the whole story, putting the narrative into the mouth of the sole survivor:

By none but me can the tale be told,
The butcher of Rouen, poor Berold.
(Lands are swayed by a king on a throne.)
'Twas a royal train put forth to sea,
Yet the tale can be told by none but me.
(The sea hath no king but God alone.)

Paying Calls in Russia.

Town life in Russia is as different as can be from life in the country districts. One curious custom is the after dinner call. People call on their friends after dinner at night or even after the theater, paying calls at midnight being quite the thing to do. The Russian dinner always begins with a sideboard course of cold meats, hors d'oeuvres, etc.—that is to say, the dishes are laid out on the sideboard and the guests help themselves before sitting down to partake of the regular meal. It is from this custom that we derive the term "service a la Russe" as applied to dinners at which the carving is done from the sideboard.—London Answers.

SISTERS WIN HONOR ROLL IN TESTS

The report made jublic yesterday by J. R. Fairgrieve, superintendent of schools contains the names of the pupils who had the best individual papers in their respective grades, all city schools considered.

Thes chool authorities take great pride in two of thew inners, viz: Yetta and Mamie Kaplan, who with a 100 per cent. mark, took honors for being the best individual scholars in the 5th and 6th grades of the city schools, respectively. The fact that the two girls are sisters is of exceptional interest. As an honor student, Mamie, the oldest of the two girls has no superior in any of the city schools, and only last month, Superintendent Fairgrieve complimented the girl on winning a spelling test which the superintendent personally conducted in the city schools.

The two girls are the daughters of Morris Kaplan of 501 Utica st. Mamie is 12 years old and Yetta is 10. Mamie attends the Rochester st. school and is in Miss Bullis's class, while Yetta is a student in the Academy st. school in Miss Lehon's room.

LOCAL BOXERS GOING TO SYRACUSE TOMORROW

Although the amateur boxers who formerly trie dto make a name for Fulton by taking trips to the Arena at Syracuse to stalk up against some prize boys there, have relaxed in their efforts to win championship laurels, there are still a number of local enthusiasts of the game who keep in touch with the fistic arena.

A number of these sportsmen are to take a trip to Syracuse tomorrow night to witness the opening program of the newly organized Genesee A. C. in which "One Round" Davis and "Sailor" Burns will engage in the final bout. Both men intend using this fight as a precedent for their meeting such heavyweights as Fred Fulton, Frank Moran and Jess Willard.

Phoenix and Baldwinsville fighters will take part in the preliminaries.

Unconquerable.

The habit of never being whipped, of always keeping up the fight—that is the quality of the great leader. The man who never admits defeat is the man the world has to take into account. Time and again the foes he is fighting may think they have him down. But before they know it he is on his feet sounding the advance. Such a man molds events. He helps create the new heavens and the new earth of the prophet's vision. A mighty force of the universe is the unconquerable soul!

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

Someone has said that when the Creator had made all the good things there still remained some work to do; so He made BEASTS and REPTILES and POISONOUS INSECTS, and when He had finished there were some scraps left; so He put all these together, covered it with SUSPICION, wrapped it with JEALOUSY marked it with a YELLOW STREAK and called it a KNOCKER.

This product was so FEARFUL to contemplate that He had to make something to counteract it; so He took a SUNBEAM, put it in the HEART of a CHILD, the Brain of a MAN, wrapped these in CIVIC PRIDE, covered it with BROTHERLY LOVE, gave it a mask of VELVET and a gasp of STEEL and called it a BOOSTER; made him a LOVER OF FIELDS AND FLOWERS, AND MANLY SPORTS, A BELIEVER IN EQUALITY AND JUSTICE, and ever since these two were, MORTAL MAN HAS HAD THE PRIVILEGE OF CHOOSING HIS OWN ASSOCIATES.

Beware of the persons who are busily engaged in the wrecking of homes and the blasting of names; they are the biggest SCOUNDRELS walking this beautiful green earth.

The building of a community is done by the men, women and children who live in that community. It depends upon thep ride they take in their community if it will grow or if decay will set in. Not all of us are born with the same feelings; not all of us think alike and that's a blessing, otherwise this world would probably not exist. But . . . we have a few things in common. For example we all feel alike toward our home. In the very depth of misery, poverty, corruptness, we still hear at times the cry for "home." The social diseased ones, after having chased all the pleasures in life, return to "home." No matter in what business a man or a woman is engaged he or she has a right to think and to act according to the best of their ability and none of us have the right to criticize them for doing so. All sorts of people make a community. Rich and poor are not only alike before their Master, but are also alike as citizens of a community and country. The poor are better than the rich, because they know how to suffer; they are contented with a little, whereas the rich are never satisfied. Another thing we have in common is, that we rally to the aid of our home, city and country, if need be. Each of us will contribute something toward the welfare of all of us. Blessed are those who have and are willing to give to those who have not. Blessed are those who are willing to give of their time and money towards the welfare of all of us. These people are creating their own heaven on earth. Those who are indifferent or unwilling will never feel comfortable, there's always something that bothers them; they can't be happy. Only those communities will prosper, where all the people assist in making it so. Why did Fulton have not always good times? Simply because most of the citizens were divided and chasing their own selfish petty interests; trying to get things they had no right to have, because they belonged to the common people. The people are to blame for bad times. How will a city prosper and make good in the terrific competition of this world, if the citizens are fighting each other; if the rotten thoughts of some are tearing down all the things the human hand and brain wrought in earlier days? CIVIC PRIDE is the cure for all this. Are you aware that you can make a good sized city out of Fulton, if you go after it the right way? Are you aware of the fact that the small petty schemes of a few are tearing down the entire system of any town, no matter where it is located; no matter if nature has given it all it had to give? Are you aware of the fact that it is YOUR SACRED DUTY to help to do away with these things? Will we ever see the time when we shall come to our own, if the people keep on fighting each other? Do you believe that a battle can be won in Europe, if the soldiers are divided? Naturally not; well you will never be recognized as a strong center of the first class, unless you help each other. You may have your differences of opinion, but you are not allowed to use these differences of opinion to KILL your TOWN and YOUR FELLOWMEN. Your time is sure to come. You may last a little longer than you should, but you will be a down and outer some time. Fulton needs the co-operation of all the people, from the most humble laboringman to the man who swims in riches. Women must help just as much as men; playing bridge and studying Shakespeare is good at times, but BAD ALL THE TIME. There are other things in this world to do and better things. GET INTO THE HABIT OF HELPING YOUR TOWN; IT WILL CHEER YOU UP. YOU WILL BE A BETTER MAN; A BETTER WOMAN, A BETER BOY, A BETER GIRL, when you have done something to help your town to become BIGGER and BETTER.

Peace Looms In Sight Is Belief of Head of Steel Corporation

New York—Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation, has issued a remarkable statement on the steel situation, business conditions in general and the war.

It follows:

"I have been requested to state briefly the conditions and prospects relating to the iron and steel industry, as they now appear and to forecast the future.

"It will be admitted by all manufacturers of these products there is no reason for complaint at the present time as to the volume or urgency of thed emand, nor, in most cases, the prices received, notwithstanding costs of production have been larger during the last few years because of increases in wages, freight charges, etc.

"The rate of production at present in the United States is about 38,000,000 tons of pig iron and about 41,000,000 tons of steel ingots per annum.

"This compares with a rate of 19,000,000 tone of pig iron and 16,000,000 tons of steel ingots one year ago and 33,500,000 tons of pig iron and 35,000,000 tons of steel ingots at high water mark in the year 1913 for pig iron and 1912 for ingots.

"Furnaces and mills are running at full capacity and it is impossible to fully supply the demand for prompt delivery.

"Prices could easily be materially advanced and perhaps will be though I believe as to some of the commodities, at least, they are high enough. It is not certain they can be controlled for the reason that the requirements of purchasers, and the offers they make, fix the prices to a large extent.

"The bookings are considerably in excess of production, which larger than ever before. Apparently about 75 per cent of the sales is for domestic consumption, and the remainder for foreign use, directly or indirectly. The influence of the export sales upon domestic sales I do not undertake to say. The ramifications, the connections and the influences are complicated, and they are uncertain.

DR. WHITAKER DEPOSED AS HEALTH OFFICER

Dr. A. L. Hall was appointed health officer of the city by the new Board of Health at last night's meeting, after Dr. G. G. Whitaker had disputed the right of the Board to dismiss him. Dr. Whitaker stated in defense that Ex-Mayor Fox had appointed him for a period for four years.

City Attorney Hillick quoted a decision of the Attorney-General substantiating the right of the Board to make the appointment of a ne whealth officer. The final result of the meeting was the passage of a resolution directing Dr. Whitaker to turn over the books and property of the Board.

Mayor Lewis, William S. Hillick, Dr. Hall, Dr. N. H. Haviland, Dr. S. D. Kellar, G. B. Clark, A. L. Morton, Mr. Fred Miller and Mr. Rexford Carey were present at the meeting.

Dr. Hall notified the City Attorney and Mayor that there was no place to care for delirious or incane cases, as the law prescribes that the jail cannot be used and there are not facilities for the retention of such cases at the hospital. In the past when a patient awaited removal to an institution for the insane a patrolman has been obliged to guard the person in the office of the Chief of Police.

PHILANTHROPY RAN AWAY WITH YOUTH

The philanthropy of an employe of a cafe prominent in the city's life developed in the young man's naration of an incident, when he met a boy having tobacco coupons in his possession, enough to secure about fifty cents worth of tobacco. The young man was offered the coupons for two cents but being a true sport, he quickly estimated the value of the coupons, bought and paid real money for them and then told his friends that he had "taken pity on the youngster and given him five cents for the lot."

WEATHER FORECAST

Partly Cloudy and colder tonight. Friday fair with moderate winds becoming northwest.

State Action Would Deprive City of Water, Says Health Officer

Dr. Whitaker, health officer during the year 1915, in his report filed January 1st and which was presented to the Board of Health last night makes known that there were during the year 74 complaints of nuisances; eleven cases of tuberculosis resulting in five death; nine typhoid fever cases; 18 cases of diphtheria, from which two died, and that the cost of operating his department was $839.86. The report covers the health officer's work in detail.

Dr. Whitaker makes mention of an inspection which was made by himself and an officer from the State Water Department of the city's water supply during March of last year, in which certain recommendations to bring about a more sanitary state of affairs, was made by thev siting representative.

The report is as follows:

To the Board of Health of the City of Fulton:

I hereby beg to transmit my report as health officer of this city for the year 1915. March 26th, I received a telegram from the State Water Department at Albany asking me to meet one of the representatives at the Broadway station who would arrive there at 8 o'clock the next morning to inspect the source of the water supply for the city. We first went to the pumphouse and inspected the building as to its cleanliness, sanitary condition and the working of the pump. We found all in good condition. We drew water from one of the taps at the pump house and also inspected Spring No. 1 and 2 and obtained water from them to be decided bacteriologically and chemically as to its purity. The surroundings of both the pump house and springs were also inspected. These were not so satisfactory owing to the lowness of the surface between the pump house, springs, and the river where water was standing the greater part of the year. The representative advised that these low grounds be filled and graded to prevent thew ater standing and seeping into the springs. This recommendation I would advise to be carried out.

We then visited the Taylor farm and Springs No. 3 and 4 and took water from same. We then inspected the surroundings which were not satisfactory. We then returned to the Tilden new Spring and took water from it and inspected the surroundings.

Whe nthe report was received after the bacteriological chemical analysis, there were no bacteria of disease found in the waters. Wa-

REGENTS' EXAMINATIONS TO BE HELD THIS MONTH IN DISTRICT SCHOOLS

Warren S. Gardner, district superintendent of schools, announces that Regents' examinations in the preliminary subjects for the Fifth Supervisory District of Oswego county, will be held as follows: Granby Center, South Granby, Hannibal Center and Southwest Oswego.

Pupils who have completed the work of the 6th Grade in geography, the 7th grade in Arithmetic, the first half of the 8th grade in spelling and the 8th grade in the other subjects may be admitted.

The program follows: Monday, January 17th, 1:15 p. m., Elementary English; Tuesday, January 18, 9:15 a. m., Arithmetic; Tuesday, January 18th, 1:15 p. m., Spelling; Wednesday, January 19th, 9:15 a. m., Geography; Wednesday, January 19th, 1:15 p. m., Elementary United States History and Civics.

The plan of holding the Regents' examination for preliminary subjects in the country schools is about four years old. The pupils were formerly obliged to try examinations at one of the High schools. Being out of their natural environment and among strange faces, students were at a disadvantage, hence the change.

Successful students in the Regents' examinations for preliminary subjects are allowed entry in Minetto, Oswego, Hannibal or Fulton high schools, without the payment of tuition.

45—PHONE NEWS ITEMS—45

Thursday, January 6, 1916.

The "see America first" cult presupposes that America is worth seeing even for those familiar with the scenic masterpieces of the old world. Referring to new acquisitions to our national park treasures, the secretary of the interior said recently that these "should be as available to all citizens of the United States as Switzerland and Italy make theirs." The National Civic association favors the establishment of a bureau of national park service, having for its work the preservation and development of the natural beauty of the park reserves and the promotion of facilities making them available to tourists. Favoring this plan, the New York Times said recently: "The love of natural beauty for itself has come, has grown, and nowhere can it be gratified more amply and more fruitfully than in the national parks. The people are getting interested then. The aim of the government—and it is a laudable aim that must be carried out—is to open them thoroughly by road and trail and give access and accommodation to every degree of income. If congress will but make the funds available for the construction of roads over which automobiles may travel with safety (for all the parks are now open to motors) and for trails to hunt out the hidden places of beauty and dignity, we may expect that year by year these parks will become a more precious possession of the people, holding them to the further discovery of America and making them still prouder of its resources, esthetic as well as material."

A problem sure to come to the fore in trying to provide adequate national defenses is the first line against invasion by water. The coast line of the United States proper is alone over 20,000 miles in length. Really we have no coast defenses at present, simply harbor defenses at various points—less than thirty, all told—on the ocean and gulf coasts. An enemy aiming at one of the big seaport cities would be more likely to land on the flank where there are no defenses than to risk attacking fortifications. Against such incursions a mobile seacoast artillery might be effective. It would manifestly be impossible to build, man and maintain fortified posts every ten miles along our entire coast line. This is the work which navies are cut out for. The naval batteries are mobile and are stronger than any mobile land artillery. A navy is needed anyway, and the bigger and better it is the more likelihood of its efficiency for coast guard, vastly less expensive than a chain of forts, and ready on call.

The War college very wisely suggests that the natural fortifications of the country be utilized for defense. For instance, it holds it a good military principle not to maintain a federal arsenal, supply depot nor plant for the manufacture of arms and munitions east or west of the great coast ranges of mountains nor within 200 miles of our borders north and south. In the one case distance and in the other difficult passes would baffle enemy attempts to strike at our military vitals.

This is the right time to keep standing prominently on the newspaper page, over the office desk, on the school blackboard and elsewhere Stephen Decatur's famous saying: "Our country! In her intercourse with foreign nations may she always be in the right, but our country right or wrong."

It costs the public in this country $5,000,000 a year to be afflicted with "ragtime." A genius with a real musical substitute could easily pick up another $5,000,000 by abolishing the nuisance for good and all.

SAVING THE PENNIES

The last two weeks have witnessed all over this broad land vindications innumerable of theo ld proverb: "A penny saved is a penny earned." It is all the result of the millions that have been saved in the penny Christmas funds conducted by hundreds of banks, savings institutions, trust companies and benevolent and protective associations, to which were added private clubs composed of women, men and boys in big buildings and industrial institutions, and even neighbors and neighbors of neighbors. The system of saving the pennies is comparatively new and is valuable, in that it is now a part of the regular banking business, therefore bearing the stamp of reliability and stability, which accounts to a degree for its rapid spread. Another point in favor of the penny system of saving is that none is too poor to save something, if only a penny, every week. When once the habit of saving has been formed a sum is easily increased to sums of larger denomination. In this way the habit of saving systematically takes root, with the frequent result that sooner or later safe investments are sought by the frugal ones; savings and loan associations secure new stockholders, and good corporations become profit-sharing affairs.

While the Christmas fund idea, in its relation to banks, is a copyrighted idea, there is nothing to prevent any body of individuals from getting together and contributing any sums they please for any purpose in the future, at their pleasure. Now that the idea is workable it should be encouraged, here, there and everywhere, for in addition to its other recommendations, is the one teaching that pennies make dimes and dimes make dollars.

Fulton needs many of the penny saving funds; and then later on, one grand big savings and loan association.

WHAT ABOUT THE COUNTRY CHURCH?

A great church held a conference on the country church last month. A President of the United States was among the speakers. And this is only one of the many indications that the necessity to revive the failing country church is sternly realized.

Great denominations are establishing departments devoted to it, seeking means by which ministers can be sent into the country educated to talk in terms of agriculture and country life. A fine illustration of the new spirit is afforded by the announcement which the Presbyterian church made when it established a department for the country church:

"The church has done everything in its power to pave the farmer's road to the Celestial City, but it has paid little attention to his road to the nearest village. It has given great sums to alleviate poverty, but it has given little thought to the causes that make for poverty—the American system of farm tenantry, the robbing of the soil, and the stripping of the hillside of its trees. It has pictured the beauties of the heavenly mansions and taken no account of the buildings in which men and women must spend their lives here and now.

"Hereafter it is going to know something about the communities it attempts to serve—of what stuff they are made, what their needs and aspirations. It will take an interest in the everyday affairs of the farmer—his crops and stock, the buildings and machinery, his lodge and recreation. The spires of the little cross-roads church will still point to the skies, but the foot-stone will be on the commonplace work of the day."

This magazine has said that "the country preacher must learn more about geography this side of Jordan"—and there are many evidences that he is trying to. We have expressed a belief that the country preacher who does not keep his head in the skies but gets down to earth as well, will meet with success and reward, both spiritual and financial. Examples such as are afforded by Diehl at Hinckley, Illinois, concerned more with problems of the whole community than with a mere sectarian sphere, are eagerly scrutinized.

Many country communities, wastefully and illogically, are merely or miserably maintaining two or more churches when one, properly conducted, would better serve the cause and the community which it must view as one. The combination of churches is much needed in many localities as thec onsolidation of schools and the church happily is coming to realize that it must justify itself materially as well as spiritually; that spiritual results are frequently only to be obtained through material means and that the route to the soul, like that to the heart, is in many instances through maternal appeal. That the country church and school must be community and social centers and that they are the beginning of a new and fine order of things is being frequently demonstrated.—Banker-Farmer.

THE PEOPLE'S CAR

The New York automobile show has centered attention upon the moderate priced car. There are the cars of luxury and the cars cheap enough and good enough for the money; but the value and the beauty of the medium priced car is the best sign of progress in the industry which is fast forging its way to the top in this country. The cars selling around $1,000, a little more or a little less are better cars for service and handsomer than cars which a few years ago brought close to $4,000. They are speedier, more powerful, of better lines and more economical than the expensive machines of a few years ago. The price is a tribute to the efficiency of the manufacturer. Only by system in making and turning out large numbers of machines is the medium priced car of present standards possible. For utility or for pleasure for a family there is no investment which gives such return as the moderate priced car.—Watertown Standard.

PAID IN FULL

William Waldorf Astor, after sixteen years of waiting, has finally achieved the object of his expatriation and becoming a British subject, and has been made a baron by King George, and can be addressed as "My Lord." It has cost him his native land, heaps of money and much fawning servility to win his title and found a British aristocratic house under the Astor name, but probably he feels elated. He was once honored by this country by being made minister to Greece, but he couldn't endure the American democracy which absolutely refused to pay him reverence, although he inherited millions accumulated by the old fur dealer, and, while he assumes a British title, he does not refuse the rents of his sixty million dollars of real estate in New York city. Mr. Astor thus becomes a hyphenated Englishman. Suppose this country and Great Britain went to war with each other, where would he stand and would he be allowed to hold his real estate in this country? A London dispatc h says that the "king's advisers entertain the belief that Mr. Astor's honor will be especially pleasing to Americans." Americans will pay no attention to it. They don't care what his honors are, though he has stripped himself of the highest honor and the proudest title in renouncing his place as an American citizen. King George makes him a baron, but his income to sustain the title comes from New York tenants.—Watertown Times.

THE YEARLY HUMILIATION

In the making of the species of inventory with which the people of the United States through their newspapers, publicists, and spokesmen in general, are accustomed to take reckoning of the national life, at the beginning of every year, there is to be found just one item of which this country has reason, as a country, to be ashamed.

That is the lynching record.

In everything else we can look the rest of the world squarely in the face. But every law-abiding American must bow his head with humiliation at the recurrence, year after year, of the tabulated array of lynching statistics.

Sixty-nine lynchings took place in this country in 1915. That is 17 more than in 1914.

So far as the evidence of one year counts, it indicates that lynching is not on the decline, but on the increase in this Union. That is an appalling thought.

Of the victims of mobs bent on murder, in 1915, four at least, were proven innocent of the crimes charged against them.

Three of those put to death were women.

Public opinion was, in an altogether exceptional degree, concerntrated against lynching and lynchers last year by one case of nationwide notoriety and circumstances of extraordinary horror—the murder by a Georgia mob, of Leo M. Frank.

It would appear that the national indignation—so vehemently manifested in this tragedy—ought to be strong enough to stay the murderous tide of lynch violence.

But no such result shows itself as yet.

Evidently the law-respecting elements of the Republic---immeasurably greater than the small portion of the population which takes the law into its own hands—have no organized means by which to make themselves felt in such a manner as to put a stop to lynching.

So the monstrosity continues.

What is needed is concerted and comprehensive effort. Few lynching mobs are so desperate as to dare public opinion if the latter really meant and acted business. If that were so, the mobs would seldom be formed and thus lynching would lose its weapon.

Detestation of lynching should be organized, disciplined and assume a form far more effective than mere sporadic indignation. Bring public opinion to compel complete utilization of the legal authority which in theory, at least, stands ready to punish lynchers, by the same system of arrest, trial and penalty which is in practice as regards other murderers and the lynch blot on the national escutcheon would be wiped out.

One of the main things this country needs is to put an end to favoritism as between murderers. — Buffalo Times.

POLISH AND ITALIAN TO BE SPOKEN MORE

The Rev. W. P. Shriver, in an address delivered to the Board of Home missions of the Presbyterian church, at Auburn, said in part:

"I wish to speak of our church's industrial and immigrant work in the cities of our land. When I say city I am referring to the downtown portion of the city. The immigrant is testing the social and religious forces at work. In theg reat manufacturing centers east of the Mississippi River and north of the Mason and Dixon line, the immigrant problem is present in its largest proportions. We are facing the problem of a new civilization—a new democracy in al lof these centers.

"In the first place there is need of a great deal of research work and painstaking scientific inquiry, if the immigrant isg oing to be properly understood. It is not the genius of us Americans to know much about the Europeans in our midst. Many pastors know little about these new forces at work. No one seems to have any adequate understanding of the problems of the downtown church. Scientific research is needed to build up a method. The question of the races that have come to America and who are destined to become a part of the evangelical church is one that we must face.

"There are three million Poles in this country. It will not be long before Polish and Italian will become the most spoken languages here outside of English. A new pamphlet is soon to be issued by the Home Board on the Poles in America. It will be them ost careful and authoritative study on the subject.

"The programme of all the churches must be based on a thorough going scientific spirit. One student is making a study of immigrant leadership. Immigrants are evolving their own leaders. Leadership emerges where there is democracy. He is fraternizing with the economic and industrial leaders among the immigrants. Later he will study the religious leadership among them. A great contribution is to be made on this subject."

PLAYED THEM BOTH WAYS.

Magical Qualities of the Pyrenees Mineral Springs.

The French comedian Perlet was extraordinarily thin. A physician recommended him to try some bath in the Pyrenees, so he betook himself to the mineral springs, where he bathed unremittingly, but all in vain; he did not increase in size. "Patience," urged the doctor. "There is nothing like our baths for making people fat."

One day while Perlet was waiting philosophically in his bath for an embonpoint which never came he heard a conversation in the next room, from which his own was divided by only a thin partition and which was occupied by an enormous woman, fat as the Hottentot Venus.

"Doctor," said she, "I am getting tired of this." "Why?" asked the Aesculapius. "I have been here two months." "Well?" "Well, I am as enormous as I was when I came." "A little patience, madame," urged the doctor. "There is nothing like our baths for making people thin."

Perlet, hearing these words, sprang out of his bath, dressed, rushed home to his hotel, ordered his bill and left for Paris by the next train.—Argonaut.

A CITY FAIR.

Build ye a city, O men,
Build ye a city fair,
But forget ye not the soul must live.
And keep for us, here and there,
A plot of grass, a towering tree,
Where over our heads we skies may see
And silvery stars on high.

Build ye a city, O men,
Build ye a city fair;
Our bodies needs must live by bread.
But keep for us, here and there,
The good brown earth, the boundless sky,
Lest our souls a-hungered grow faint and die
Mid thy towering city fair.

Build ye a city, O men,
Build ye a city fair;
Build Gothic arch and marble hall.
But keep for us, here and there,
A plot of green, a waving tree,
Where in times of stress our souls may see
The light, for thy city fair.

CLUB HELPS VILLAGE.

Fifty Women Work Along Lines of Public Improvement.

The New Century club of Cobleskill, N. Y., was organized in 1896. It was federated with the New York State Federation of Women's Clubs in 1906 and with the General federation in 1915. The club has an active membership of fifty women, who are working along progressive lines. Matters of village improvement receive much attention, and the committees of public health and civics have recently been added to the other standing committees.

The work of the club has broadened until along with its literary study the organization is actively engaged in philanthropic and civic work. Last year the club gave $75 to the school library, and previously it had given a great many trees to beautify the village parks, besides lending a hand whenever needed for the social and moral uplift of the community.

Campaign of Southern Cities.

Representatives in commercial clubs of important cities in the south met recently at Nashville, Tenn., to devise ways and means of exploiting and advertising the section.

Realizing the south's tremendous business possibilities, many cities sent delegates.

Business men of the sixteen states south of the Ohio river declare capital has failed to recognize latent commercial possibilities in this territory. They contend that the fault is not so much with the capitalist and investor as in the lack of incentive offered big business to locate in the south and in a failure to exploit resources and natural advantages.

To acquaint the rest of the world with existing conditions a systematic publicity campaign is planned to bring about improved business conditions in the south.

When fully developed and in operation upon the basis proposed this campaign, it is promised, will be the most effective in the history of commercial advertising.

Cities have successfully advertised themselves, but never has any entire section attempted such an undertaking. Experts in publicity say this aspect of the campaign will of itself attract worldwide attention.

Advertising the Quaker City.

A movement to advertise Philadelphia as a manufacturing city before every trade body in the country was inaugurated recently at a meeting of the chamber of commerce. Through a committee of 100 business men, known as the Philadelphia traveling commission, the commercial activities of the city, its markets and products will be made known to every town from coast to coast.

Our Washington Letter

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE

Washington—Representative Philip Pitt Campbell of Kansas, one of the most astute Republicans of the House, views the outlook for 1916 with great complacency and optimism. He says: "The Republicans are not doing any worrying this time. Ther ecent gathering of the Democratic national committee showed conclusively that their enthusiasm of four years ago was conspicuous by its absence. Then they displayed the utmost confidence, now they are going about with apprehension and misgivings. The Democrats are getting their only comfort and cheer from the fact that the Republicans have not settled on any candidate. I believe the Republicans were never so strong as when there was doubt about whom to nominate. When we meet in convention next year we will name some great and good man who will lead us to victory and to national prosperity."

Former Congressman Politte Elvine, of Elvins, Mo., was on the floor of the House greeting old friends and acquaintances, during the past week. At the time he was elected he was one of the youngest man ever chosen to Congress. Mr. Elvins is a business man and is one of the leading Republicans of Missouri and was a delegate to the Chicago convention from that state, in 1912. In speaking of the outlook in Missouri from a Republican angle in 1916, he said to a group of members: "Just keep your eye on Missouri in the elections of 1916. I think we have a most excellent chance to carry the state for president and also to elect a Republican United States Senator. Our party is united and is pulling together, while our political foes are having troubles of their own. The tariff and other policies of the Democratic party are not in accord with the views of thousands of voters in Missouri and there is every indication that our state will swing into the Republican column by a substantial majority next year."

"I can tell you the people of my district are not shouting praises at the policies of Woodrow Wilson," said a border state Democratic Congressman to a group of his bretbren. "From one end of my district to the other the President is being condemned for his lack of backbone in dealing with the Mexican question. You people who live far away from the border have no idea of the indignities and the atrocities that have been permitted to go by unnoticed by the present administration. It has been impossible to get satisfaction or justice and the pleas of hundreds of American citizens have fallen on deaf ears. In my own district citizens of this country have been murdered in cold blood, their goods and chattels stolen and at times they have been compelled to protect and defend their property. Protests have been in vain. What has taken place along the border for the past year or more, will forever be a blot upon American history and American diplomacy. When the people realize the true conditions and become acquainted with the real facts, they will be appalled."

"It is easy enough to see where Maine is going," said a representative of the Pine Tree state, to a group of colleagues on the floor. "With Portland electing a Republican mayor for the first time in five years by the great majority of 1,338 in the 12,000 votes cast, it shows that our state is getting back to strong Republican moorings, where it belongs. In 1916 Maine can be counted on to roll up one of its old-time, old-fashioned majorities for protection and prosperity. The people have had their fill of Democracy. In the great manufacturing centers of our state the tariff policy of that party, as exemplified by the workings of the Underwood bill, has raised havoc with industry and labor. We are not only going to win nationally, but we will return a Republican United States senator, a solid congressional delegation and win a handsome victory for our state ticket. The party differences of 1912 have been forgotten and we are once more all pulling together, harmonious and united, battling for progress and prosperity."

The Modern Poet.

"I find the market page the most valuable department of the paper," said the poet.

"I can't understand," said the business man, "why you should be interested in the market page."

"Look at it," exclaimed the poet. "It's brimful of quotations."—St. Louis Republic.

CREED FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

Edward T. Stitt, district superintendent of the New York city schools, has issued a "city creed for social service," which reads:

We believe—

That social betterment of the masses can be best accomplished by a wider use of our school plants.

That the conservation of our youths is as important as that of our national resources.

That low taxes are to be favored if they do not lead to a low standard of living.

That all people who work shall have an opportunity to play.

That strength of body allied to strength of mind will develop goodwill around Americans.

That the personality of our teaching force and a conservation of their energies are necessary in social regeneration.

That large cities should be as proud of sturdy children and strong workmen as of beautiful parks or public buildings.

That the best monuments of which a city can boast are the upright lives of its happy and contented citizens.

That the many millions spent for warfare would be better spent for welfare.

That as the Declaration of Independence not only guarantees life and liberty, but also the pursuit of happiness, it is the sacred duty of every city to provide rest and recreation for its weary wage earners.

A Cabin From a Redwood Log.

There is a cabin in Golden Gate park, San Francisco, which is constructed of a single log of redwood. It is about twelve feet long and rests upon a heavy platform of timbers which support the weight of the hollowed log. A doorway about five feet high and eighteen inches wide admits visitors to the interior, which forms a fair sized room. The appearance of the cabin is striking because the front presents a cross section of a large redwood tree with the bark intact.—Popular Science Monthly.

Art Criticism.

The great Constable at a varnishing day at the Royal academy paused before A's picture and said:

"Very good, especially the sky. The sky is superb."

Then he passed on to B and said.

"A's picture is very bad. Go look at it. The sky is like putty."

So B went and looked and then exclaimed as if to himself:

"Why, I like the sky!"

"Well," cried A, the painter of the picture, "why shouldn't you like my sky?"

"But Constable said it was like putty," B explained confusedly.

So A, in a furious rage, strode up to Constable and shouted:

"Constable, you're a humbug! I never asked for your opinion about my picture, yet you came to me and praised it. You said that especially you liked my sky. Then at once you go off and tell some one else that my sky is like putty."

Constable listened with a smile. He was not at all confused.

"My dear fellow, you don't understand," he said: "I like putty."

What We Eat.

It has been estimated that on the average each resident of this country annually consumes 80.3 pounds of beef, 7.5 of veal, 6.5 of mutton, 10 of lard and 67.5 of pork, a total of practically 172 pounds. In addition each of us eats, on the average, 17.5 pounds of butter, 3.8 pounds of cheese, 17 pounds of ice cream, 1.5 pounds of oleomargarine and about 475 pounds of milk.

Human Mystery.

Almost every man believes in the mystery of woman. I do not. For men are also mysterious to women; women are quite as puzzled by our stupidity as by our subtlety. I do not believe that there is either a male or a female mystery; there is only the mystery of mankind.—W. L. George in Atlantic Monthly.

SCHOOL FOR FIREMEN.

Novel Plan Inaugurated by Pittsburgh For Increasing Efficiency of Firemen.

Pittsburgh has opened its school for firemen, says the Town Development Magazine. Hereafter every man in every fire company in the city will be required to demonstrate his fitness for his work or be dismissed. Work on the building, or tower, in Neville street is completed. The school is under the personal supervision of Fire Chief James F. Richards and Police and Fire Surgeon D. E. Sable and the district chiefs. Actual instruction in modern fire fighting and other hazardous work entailed thereby will be under the direction of Captain James Kane, Fireman Alva Foster and Dr. Sable, all of whom spent a month in the New York school of instruction.

The firemen are taking a deep interest in the work, and there is keen rivalry among the various companies to make the best showing.

The tower is ninety feet high, a six story building.

Ladder and hose drills, rescue work and instruction in pulmotor application are among the first lessons taught.

KATHRYN OSTERMAN IN "THE BLUDGEON"

There are plenty of tense, gripping situations in the five-part screen drama "The Bludgeon," which is the next release on the Equitable program at the Quirk theatre, and will be shown today. Behind the dramatic episodes of the play, and in fact their main spring, is a story of love, social ambition, and the whole group of passions which naturally surround a woman who endeavors to live beyond the means her husband is able to provide. Kathryn Osterman, the star of the play, as the ambitious and foolish wife, finds in Paul Armstrong's successful drama plenty of scope for her histrionic powers, and uses them to the utmost. Between the opening scene in the little cottage where she, her husband, and their small daughter Rose are living, and the finale, where they have returned to the cottage as to a haven of rest from the false glitter and the dangers attending an attempt to achieve society standards, there is a constant succession of incidents, every one of which tells its story and enforces its moral.

The product of the Equitable's own studios, "The Bludgeon," is a remarkably fine example of staging, direction and photography.

IRISH POTATOES ARE NOT IRISH

Auburn Club Woman Says They're Better Cooked With Their Jackets on Than Pared.

Auburn's Housekeepers' club was addressed the other day by Miss Louise Montgomery, the subject being potatoes and rice as food and their preparation. The address in part follows:

"Potatoes cooked with the skins on are better than those pared. The chief mineral element is potash, an important substance in the blood. Potash is easily soluble in water and when the skin is removed there is nothing to prevent these salts from escaping into the water.

"Letheby found in experimenting that potatoes cooked with their skins only lost 3 per cent. of their nutriment and those without 14 per cent. or more than two ounces in every pound.

"Steaming, roasting and baking are the best methods.

"Cook potatoes in boiling, slightly salted water.

"Bake potatoes in hot oven.

Rice a Good Substitute

"Rice should be used more often as a vegetable and as a substitute for potatoes.

"Macaroni is used by many people and especially by those of southern Europe and is also a substitute for potatoes.

"Beans are a substitute for both meat and potatoes.

"Whole wheat may also be used. Last iWnter during the hard times one man fed 1,000 men in New York City on a cent a day each. He gave each man a quart of whole wheat cooked, one-half ounce of cheese and six datec. The men were well fed though on a monotonous diet.

"The sweet potato is a native of the Malayan Archipelago where it formerly grew wild. It was then taken to Spain and from there to England.

"At first it was a delicacy and found only on the tables of the rich. Shakespeare and other writers speak of it.

"What has been said of the common potato is applicable to the sweet potato. It too is best cooked with the skins on. Sweet potatoes combined with tart apples are good for serving with duck or roast pork.

"On the continent of Europe potatoes are not as commonly used as in this country or England. Rice is the common article of food among a large part of the inhabitants of the globe."

GREEK HOLIDAY TOMORROW

Tomorrow, Christmas according to the Julian calendar, will be celebrated by Greeks al over thew orld. Beginning tomorrow and continuing for over a week the most holy time of the entire year for the Greeks is celebrated and during that period numerous Greek delegations from other towns, where there is no Ruthenian church, are expected to come here for worship.

In Greece three days are given over to the celebration of Christmas but in America only Thursday will be observed. Just as Venus, the evening star, is seen Thursday night, after a fast all during the day, the Ruthenians will partake of a big feast in which meat will form no part. To symbolize the birth of Christ in the manager, a thin layer of straw will be placed beneath the tablecloth at every board in Ruthenian homes. After the feast all will assemble in the churches for the singing of hymns of praise. Then will be observed the service called Paweczernyca when bread, wine, wheat and oil is blessed.

In cities where Greek colonies obtain church services will begin in the morning at 9 o'clock and at 10 o'clock High Mass will be said. At evening services thep riest will assign singers to visit Ruthenian houses and there sing Yuletide carols and solicit funds for carrying on church work. Twelve more singers will likewise be selected to visit the homes and offer songs of Peace on Earth and Good Will Toward Men.

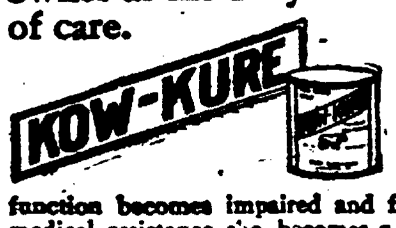
Why Do Dairy Cows Run Down?

No other farm animal is the cause of so much anxiety to the owner as his dairy cows; sickness gets in in spite of the best of care.



Why? Because the dairy cow is subjected to constant forcing to get the maximum in quantity and quality of the milk yield.

This constant strain proves too much for many a good cow; some important function becomes impaired and for want of proper medical assistance she becomes a "backward" cow. In just such cases as these Kow-Kure has made its reputation for success when used to

of the herd. Kow-Kure is a medicine for cows only—not a stock food. It has wonderful medicinal qualities that act on the organs of production and reproduction for the prevention or cure of many serious cow ailments. It is especially useful in cases of Abortion, Barrenness, Milk Fever, Scouring, Lost Appetite, Bunches, Retained Afterbirth, etc. Farmers who have used it keep Kow-Kure on hand constantly. Most feed dealers and druggists sell it.

BASKETBALL GAMES SCHEDULED TONIGHT

Basketball fans will come into their own tonight and tomorrow when two high class basketball games are scheduled in which the two best teams in the city will meet opponents from the salt and starch cities.

Tonight the Maccabee quintet will stack up against the fast Syracuse Boys' Club Royals, one of the best teams in Syracuse, while tomorrow night the High school boys will have a chance to repay the Oswego Normals for the defeat administered to them in Oswego before the holidays.

Eight men are on the Maccabee squad, and it is impossible for Captain Ives to select his regular quintet. Crockett for center and Ives and O'Brien are fixtures at the forward positions, but the two holders of the guard positions are an uncertainty.

It would not be consistent to expect a victory over their more experienced opponents, still the Maccabee supporters carry in their minds the upsetting of "dope" when the Goosebones and Mohawks of Oswego came here to play their favorites with all the odds in favor of the visiting quintets. The decisive defeats given the Oswego favorites has given both the Maccabee team and its supporters a great deal of confidence, and a victory tonight over the Syracuse boys would not be a distinct surprise.

SPEAKER SWEET ADVISES CAUTION

Tells Assembly Wisdom Dictates Caution---People the Final Arbiters---Confidence Must Be Won.

THADDEUS C. SWEET

Albany—The 1916 Legislature settled down to business at noon yesterday, with Republican majorities in both houses, organized for the work of the year, listened to Governor Whitman's message urging a change in the financial policy of the state and received a host of bills and proposed constitutional amendments. Adjournment then was taken until Monday night.

In the Assembly bouquets adorned the desk of many members, but in the Senate not a flower was to be seen.

The slate indorsed by the party caucuses in the Assembly last night went through without a hitch. Thaddeus C. Sweet, of Oswego, was selected speaker by a majority of 49 votes over Joseph M. Callahan, Democrat, of New York. The vote was: Sweet, 94; Callahan, 45. Abraham I. Shiplacoff and Hamilton Fish, jr., the sole representatives of the Socialist and Progressive parties, respectively, did not vote. Fred W. Hammond of Syracuse was re-elected clerk and Harry W. Haines of Westchester, sergeant-at-arms.

In the Senate the organization of last year was continued, with Elon R. Brown of Watertown and Robert F. Wagner the leaders of the Republican and Democratic delegations. Senator Wagner was the only absentee. He is ill at his home in New York.

The Speaker's Address

As soon as the applause which greeted Speaker Sweet had subsided the Oswego county leader said:

"It is a genuine pleasure to welcome to the Assembly the representatives chosen by the people to take part in the legislation of the session of 1916. It is especially gratifying to know that the roll of members of this body contains the names of so many who return here with the emphatic approval of their constitutents of the labors heretofore performed. It is pleasant to know that we are not only here as servants of the people, but we approach our duties with the comforting knowledge that we are in harmony with our honored Executive and the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature.

"I should be untrue to myself or to the instincts of my nature and unmindful of my feelings of appreciation toward you if I did not give you the assurance of my profound gratitude for the honor you have shown me. I can only promise to do my duty fearlessly and to be fair and just toward you all. In your approval and in the approval of our constituents I shall find my best reward.

"We are entering upon a busy and exciting year. An important national election is pending and we shall soon be discussing the vital issues of a presidential campaign. The gods of war still control the destinies of the countries over the sea, and we should be thankful that our country is not yet involved in the conflict which checks thew orld and fills us all with horror. Let us hope that the year before us may bring to us a continuance of that prosperity which thrives best upon peace, and that the spirit of good will toward men may soon encompass thee ntire world.

"The perplexing question of the reapportionment of the state will engage your attention and it is hoped that your knowledge of mathematics will enable you to please all sections of the state in thep roblems which you will have to solve.

"My experience in business has taught me that the only way to accomplish results is by diligent pursuit of the work in hand. This rule will apply in legislation as in any other business. It is my purpose to announce your committees at once and thus indicate my desire to encourage in every way a prompt performance of our duties.

"Let us impress upon you the importance of presenting at once any legislation proposed by you, to the end that measures may be promptly and carefully considered. Let me also impress upon the chairmen of committees the necessity of organizing their committees without delay in order that the consideration of business may at once begin. Let us commence now to labor for a short and busy session. Let us commence our committee work at the earliest possible moment that we may conclude it in order and without undue haste. You will agree with me that it is not businesslike to allow the early weeks of the session to pass without serious attention to the work before us, and at its close to crowd into a few days the work which should have been spread over the preceding weeks. Let us strive to place no laws upon the statute books which have not been intelligently and carefully considered. We shall be judged at the bar of public opinion not by the number of measures we introduce, not by the number of laws we enact, but by the character and necessity of such laws. We shall be judged not by promises, but by results, not by profession; but by performance. The actual needs of the commonwealth should govern the nature and number of our enactments. The government is founded upon good laws. If the laws are just the government must be lasting. We are sworn servants of the people. Let us be faithful to the trust imposed upon us. Let us measure the laws by the interests of the state. Let us promise the people a short, active, business session of the Assembly and then keep our promise.

"It is quite probable that you will be called upon to consider some of the questions submitted to the last election recommended by the Constitutional Convention. There may be portions of the proposed Constitution which will meet your approval. We have learned that is it not algether wise to submit constitutional amendments in large quantities. Let the people have an opportunity to study each question submitted and thus give them the power of exercising their best judgment in the formation of a new Constitution.

"As expressed by the voice of the people at the last election, we are still their most direct representativs and we have their confidence. Faithful and intelligent discharge of our duties as members of this body and servants of the people will retain their confidence and their commendation."

Charles R. Hotaling of Selkirk and John K. Marshall of New York were re-elected sergeant-at-arms and stenographer of the Senate.

Designations Announced

Committee assignments of the Assembly were announced by Speaker Sweet. This is the first time in the history of the State that the designations have been announced on the opening day. The make-up of the more important committees follow, the first name in each case indicating the chairman, all of whom are Republicans:

Ways and Means—Maier, Wheeler, Seaker, Machold, Brereton, Tallett, Seelye, Talmage, Martin, Law, Kenyon, Graves, Callahan, McElligott, Bush.

ASSEMBLYMAN MACHOLD NOMINATES MR. SWEET

Albany—The nominating speech was made by Assemblyman Machold of Jefferson County, Wheeler of Ontario and Law of Winchester seconded the nomination.

"I rise to place in nomination the name of the same man who was selected as the presiding officer of this body in 1914 and 1915," began Assemblyman Machold.

"It is a great pleasure to present his name here again tonight for the same high office. His record is one that stands for itself. His election to the Assembly in 1915 helped the Republican candidate for Governor and the fact that he has twice been selected to preside over the deliberations of this body attests his fitness for still another term as Speaker."

In seconding the nomination, Assemblyman Wheeler said:

"I am proud to second the nomination of Thaddeus C. Sweet as Speaker of this house. It is a great honor when a man has served so well as Speaker Sweet. The result of all the members of the Assembly has gone out to him for his uniform courtesy and fairness."

Assemblyman Law said that he wished to state, in also seconding the nomination, that the members from Westchester County stood with him. "Such honest, distinguished and impartial services as have been rendered by Thaddeus C. Sweet worthily deserve the recognition of his election as Speaker again," Assemblyman Law declared.

Assemblyman Machold introduced a resolution requiring the clerk to call the roll, each member to announce his vote. Then it was found that there were no other candidates for Speaker.

LEGISLATION AIMED AT THE TAX DODGERS

Albany—Legislation designed to lessen tax-dodging will be sought by two State Departments. Controller Eugene M. Travis, in his annual report, recommends revision of the stock corporation law to counteract the "subtle strategems of tax-dodgers." and the report of the State Tax Commission favors enactment of laws providing for "the prevention of the use of savings banks for the purpose of evading taxation."

COW AND CALF EAT PAINT THEM JUMP INTO RIVER

Carrollton, Ky.—Jack Dean lost a cow and a calf in a peculiar way. He had been painting and had put an empty paint bucket in an outhouse. The cow and calf got to the bucket and licked it. It seemed to make them sick, and Mr. Breeck was called. That evening while giving them medicine the calf made a rush for the bank of the river and jumped over

Supposing it had killed itself, they waited until light to look it up.

The next day they could not find it or any signs of what had become of it The next evening while doctoring the cow, the cow got loose and rushed over the cliff.

They took the lantern and went to see if it was killed and got there just in time to see it make for the river and drown. It seemed a clear case of suicide.

UTICA ELKS DEDICATE THEIR $125,000 HOME

Utica—Last night Utica Lodge of Elks enjoyed the proud privilege of dedicating the new and magnificent home of the lodge at the corner of Mary and Charlotte streets. In this home of architectural beauty, which cost the lodge something in the neighborhood of $125,000 or more, the lodge met to witness and perform the impressive exercises which embraced the program of dedication. And with the close of these exercises a formal dinner was served in honor of the presence here of the Grand Exalted Ruler of the Order, James R. Nicholson of Boston. Mr. Nicholson has risen in about a dozen years to the most exalted position in the realm of Elkdom and his presence in Utica for the dedication is a pleasing testimonial of his appreciation of the splendid achievement of Utica Lodge of Elks.

BISHOP SCORES NEGLECT OF FOREIGN-BORN PEOPLE

Utica —Bishop Burt of Buffalo made the opening address here at the conference on evangelism, his subject being: "Immediate Responsibility." His opening question was "Where Is It," and he gave his own answer, "First, in your own family. How can you rest when there is one outside of the fold? Your own church people, your own community and your own country. By that I mean every person in your community and country."

Bishop Burt then proceeded to point out the disgrace that the Christians of America were bringing upon themselves by the neglect of the foreigners within the gates.

BELIEVE ONLY HALF YOU HEAR OF THE GOSPEL OF THE DEAD ONES

And of the Badness of Men Who Are Doing Real Things for Your Town

And then make up your mind to drink some water to wash down the rest you hear,

AND REMEMBER,

The People who libel Clean Propositions are the people who crawl into dark caves and pull the caves in after them, and do shut out the sunlight.

BEHOLD,

"None are so blind as those who will not see." And when the howlers against men who are DOING THINGS, and Propositions which are successful in spite of the lamentations of the dead ones, will not take what they have earned, in the way they should take it, then shall this city wax fat and the merchants shall wax strong.

A BIT OF THE GOSPEL OF GOOD TIMES FOR FULTON

The Professor's Experiment

By M. QUAD

Copyright, 1915, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

Professor Brixton Longbody was a born philosopher and a logician. At fifteen years old he had read more philosophy than forty average men combined.

At the age of twenty-five young Longbody was appointed professor of logic and philosophy at a state university.

One afternoon the professor was crossing the campus when he picked up a book that some one had dropped or thrown away. It was entitled "The Life of Vidocq." Never in all his days had he read a criminal or a detective story. He had never let his profound mind dwell for three seconds on such literature. Behold, the time had come! That night he sat up until past midnight reading that book. It was a new revelation to him, a new world of thought.

He analysed Vidocq's logic and philosophy and found fault with them.

He counted up the number of blunders that the average criminal made in a case and was amazed that the fellow had not been overhauled in half a day. After reading the book twice over he laid it aside with a sigh-of:

"Dear me, what a pack of idiots! And how easy to have been sensible! As a detective I would have made a great success. As a criminal I fear that I should have been more successful."

Do what he would, Professor Longbody could not drive away these thoughts. In a couple of weeks, as he walked out, he imagined himself either a criminal or a detective. Sometimes he was ashamed and indignant at himself, and at other times he was rather pleased. In passing down a certain street the professor noticed that a parlor window in a certain house was half raised. A night or two later he passed the same house an hour before midnight and noticed that the same window was still up.

"Careless people—very careless," he whispered to himself. "That's a plain invitation for a robber to enter and plunder the house."

It made him angry with the owner of the place. Was it his duty to teach the man a lesson? Would you believe that the great philosopher argued that it was?

The professor would enter that house by night. By the open window? No, sir; he was too sharp for that. That would be the road of the common criminal, and it would be a fearful blunder. The owner of the house was inviting a would be robber to climb in that window to get caught in a bear trap or lose his life by a spring gun.

The professor bought a dark lantern. He put a few tools in his pockets and set out one night to commit a philosophical and logical burglary. He was expected at the front. Therefore he appeared at the back and attacked what he judged was the pantry window.

Professor Longbody went into that window like a monkey. He was not mistaken about its being the pantry. The door leading into the dining room was shut, and it was time for that dark lantern. It was flashed—that is, there was no flash. A dark lantern had been bought all right, but the professor had not bought any oil to fill it. He must hunt for matches in a strange house at midnight. He had forgotten to post himself as to whether the house was lighted by electricity, gas or lamps, but he softly opened the door and found himself in a room almost as dark. Where was the match safe, if there was one? In the kitchen probably. He went feeling his way for about ten feet. Then he bumped up against a table and involuntarily put out his hands, and they struck a pile of dishes and tumbled them to the floor.

The professor crouched on the floor and waited with beating heart, and he had only a few seconds to wait. The room was suddenly flooded with an electric light, and a man came running downstairs, revolver in hand. No move was made to get away. On the contrary, the teacher of philosophy and logic got to his feet and sat down on a chair.

"Well?" queried the man with the gun as he sat down on another.

"Is it of any use to say anything?" replied Professor Longbody.

"Oh, yes," replied the householder. "You see, I know you. You teach philosophy and logic at the school, but you don't practice what you teach."

"I was making an experiment," was the rather weak reply.

"Yes; I have expected you since you first saw that open window. I happened to be watching you that day. You had convinced yourself that you were smarter than the smartest criminal."

"Y-e-s."

"What are you going to do with me?" asked the professor.

"Why, nothing, professor, nothing at all. You are free to go. You have made your little experiment, and it has been a stupendous blunder and a dire failure."

"I thank you, sir, for understanding it that way," replied the erudite man.

"Oh; no thanks, my dear man. Before you go, however, let me tell you that a robber came around here while you were at work in the back and effected an entrance to the house next door, which is taking care of itself while the family are away. I presume his plunder will be valued at $500 at least. Good night, Professor Longbody. Keep it up and stick to your textbooks."

ONCE BANKER, FULLER IS NOW DAY LABORER

When Bank Failed He Was Glad to Get Strenuous Job.

Winslow, Ill.—From a well dressed banker to a day laborer in overalls is the transition of J. Bradley Fuller, who, with his sisters owned and operated the private bank of Fuller & Son at Winslow. Necessity forced the former banker to obtain means of support.

The only occupation available was that of helping manufacture concrete blocks. He is paid $2 a day for ten hours and is docked for every hour in which he is not occupied.

Upon the recent return of Fuller from the east, his departure taking place just one week prior to the failure of the bank; he was on the verge of nervous prostration. The sympathy of his friends assisted in restoring his nerves to their normal condition, and he announced his willingness to take any kind of work which afforded himself and his family a living.

After seeking in vain for some occupation more remunerative and with less physical labor involved, he went to work with the concrete firm and expects to remain there until something more inviting develops. His family take their reduced circumstances philosophically, all seeking employment in order to contribute to the common fund.

The report of the auditing board, of which D. F. Graham, president of the First National bank of Freeport is chairman, shows that the liabilities of the Winslow bank are $168,947, while the assets are $120,935. On this basis depositors will receive about 70 cents on the dollar. The auditor assumed that the assets credited to a furniture manufacturing company of Manitowoc, Wis., amounting to $20,000, would not depreciate.

WIFE SAVED HIM.

Rode 300 Miles With Baby on Pony to Plead For Her Husband.

Salem, Ore.—The hardships of a 300 mile horseback trip made by Mrs. Walter Quick and baby of Lakeview over mountainous trails to plead for the release of her husband from the state prison were not without avail, the state parole board deciding to recommend to the government that Quick be paroled.

Quick will be confronted with the problem of reaching his home when Governor Withycombe orders his release. He has a homestead near Lakeview, 300 miles from Salem, and his only means of transportation is the pony on which his wife and baby made the long trip here.

Quick was sent to prison for the theft of a sack of oats and a box of shotgun shells.

Anti-girl Club Formed.

Kendalville, Ind.—Thirty-five young bachelors of this city have organized the Anti-girl club. To be caught taking a young woman to a theater, dance or other social function or home from church or even to make a social call will cost the member $5. The "high cost of entertainment" is given as the cause for organizing.

Just Laugh.

A man who cannot take a joke
Should not permit himself to poke
Fun at his friends' own foibles, lest
There is a comeback to the jest.
And, honestly, we would lose half
The fun without an answering laugh.
—Judge.

Strenuous Act.

"What's the matter with the strong man?" the manager asked half an hour before the curtain was to go up.

"Oh, he sent word he couldn't appear today," the assistant manager replied.

"What's the matter?" the manager excitedly demanded. "Was he in an accident? That juggling act of his with cannon balls was one of the best things in the show."

"No; he had to help his wife with the dishes last night, and he's got a lame back."—Kansas City Star.

The Saving of A Household

By EVERETT P. CLARKE

When Helen announced to me that her mother must come to live with us I knew at once that we had come down with a severe case of mother-in-law. There was no escape from the matter. Mrs. Goldwin had been living with a sister who had died, and she was now alone. Helen was her only child, and to refuse the old lady would be sacrilegious. For me to refuse my wife's desire would be equally so. I consented, well knowing that if the mother-in-law remained with us long enough I should be obliged to go elsewhere.

"How does your mother stand on the votes for women question?" I asked Helen.

"She's a vigorous anti."

Since I made no reply to this Helen wanted to know why I asked and when I gave no satisfactory reply said that this would not make any difference, since we were both indifferent on the subject.

Mrs. Goldwin came and saw and conquered. There was no reason for our not getting on pleasantly together except that for forty years she had managed her household and she was too old to go into any one else's house and relinquish the habit. If our maid did not suit her the maid must leave. This kept my wife changing servants and me in misery. We finally gave up trying to keep one, Helen saying that she thought that, with her mother's help, she could easily do the work herself.

This made matters worse, because Mrs. Goldwin insisted on having everything done her way, and Helen was obliged to do it all over again. The old lady might have made possible our going out occasionally evenings by taking care of our little girl, two years old, but she positively declined to take upon herself such responsibility, declaring that "if the the child should get the croup what would I do?" Nevertheless when Helen was present her mother insisted on directing her in her care of the child.

Something must be done. It wouldn't do for me to tell Helen that I was concocting a plan to get rid of her mother. In that case I stood a good chance of being the one to leave. I was obliged to keep my own counsel. One day I announced to Helen that my Aunt Martha needed a home. There were many reasons why we should take her in. What she and Mrs. Goldwin paid us for board would pay our house rent and leave us something over. Then, too, her dear mother would have a companion, and it was quite likely that the two of them would consent to take care of Lucy while we saw something of the world in the evening.

Helen didn't see it in that light, and for the first time I was obliged to gain my own way by domineering. But I thought that it was better to risk a break at this time than have one certainly later, for I am not one of those patient, forbearing men who will suffer my life and my wife's life to be spoiled by some one who had no business to spoil it.

Aunt Martha came. At first it appeared that the reason I had given for her coming showed my wisdom. Miss Goldwin took a great fancy to my aunt, and it seemed that the two old ladies would become very chummy.

I knew better.

At the second dinner we all had together I said, "Aunt Martha, what's news in the suffragist camp?"

Helen looked at me with wide open eyes. Evidently she saw my plan. She crouched as one waiting for a storm to burst.

"You don't mean," said Mrs. Goldwin, "that you are in favor of women voting?"

"I certainly am," replied Aunt Martha, setting her lower jaw.

"That certainly can't make any difference to you two," interposed Helen. "You don't have to discuss the suffrage question."

"Certainly not," I put in, well knowing that I had thrown a bomb between them with a fuse attached that would certainly bring about an explosion sooner or later.

The two ladies maintained for some time a discreet silence. Whether they would have continued to do so I don't know, but I do know that they would not if I could prevent. The next day at dinner I said:

"Aunt Martha, I see by the morning's paper a statement that in those states which have adopted woman's suffrage"—

"Charles!"

My wife looked a demand that I desist. I desisted. Having touched a match to the fuse, I waited for the explosion.

It came.

"I have seen those statements," said Mrs. Goldwin, "and they are conclusive."

"I, too, have seen them," said my aunt, "and they are absolutely false."

Fearing that my presence might dampen the argument, I left the table. The next day when I came home from business Helen told me that my aunt must leave. I took the ground that if either left it should be her mother.

There was a divided household, but not for long, I being for a compromise—that is, that both ladies should find other abodes—and in time secured it.

Helen and I are still living together in peace and comfort and connubial bliss.

Woman's World

Lady Aberdeen, Visitor to America, With Thanks From British Women.

LADY ABERDEEN.

"The National Council of Great Britain and Ireland is glad of an opportunity of sending by the hands of the international president a message of its great thankfulness to the women of America for the help that they have so generously given to Europe in her hour of need."

This is the message Lady Aberdeen brings to the women of America.

Lady Aberdeen is the president of the World's Dominion of the Council of Women. It is the highest office in women's affairs in the world. In this capacity she opened the international congress of women at the Young Women's Christian association auditorium at the Panama-Pacific exposition recently.

From the first congress session the titled visitor went to the California building, where she was a guest of honor at a luncheon given by the women's board of the Panama-Pacific International exposition. After the luncheon the guest, with other women who had assembled to do her honor retired to the ballroom of the building where the ceremony of presenting a plaque to Lady Aberdeen was held.

In her response Lady Aberdeen made a direct appeal to the womanhood of America to help the world when the war is over. She said:

"I feel deeply honored at thus being made the guardian of this memorial plaque and deem it a privilege to hold in my hand this symbol of all that Director Brown has said the women of California have meant to the exposition managers. It has been a great joy to come here at the invitation of the president of the United States Council of Women.

"Women have proved equal to the opportunities offered them and to the burdens imposed upon them. The present conditions of war make it now impossible for the international bonds to hold women together, but nationally women are still devoted to the principles of the council. But we look to the future, when international and national bonds of friendship and service will be of equal potency, for we have seen what a country loses which uses only half its population.

"We are facing the work which waits us at the end of the war. We face it with unshrinking courage. It will be a time of new problems and difficulties. The women of Europe expect that the women of America will nobly help in the great work of reconstruction."

LIGHT HOUSEKEEPING.

What Delectable Edibles Can Be Concocted if We Try.

Many a woman living in a two room and bath apartment and taking her meals in an adjoining public dining room yearns at times for something "homemade" and delicious—chocolate layer cake, for instance, or scalloped oysters, or old fashioned molasses cake, or soda biscuits tender and piping hot and made rich with little shortening. One woman condemned—as she expresses it—to live in a luxurious hotel apartment most of the year satisfies her housewifely instincts by getting Sunday night tea in her own apartment by aid of a chafing dish, a coffee percolator and a one burner gas stove with a little oven about as big as a baby's hatbox.

It is surprising how many delectable things can be baked in this absurd little oven. Out of it come small layer cakes, pans of light biscuits, toothsome little drop cakes, small pans of piping hot Sally Lunn and rich gingerbread for the Sunday night supper. The little oven bakes only a small quantity—enough biscuits for four persons, twice around, and layer cake which makes six good sized slices—but the Sunday night opportunities to have a taste of real home cooking are much appreciated by privileged guests who also dwell in boarding places.

No woman with fastidious taste—and thought for her neighbors—would venture to cook steaks or fry potatoes in an apartment house where odors of cooking are not supposed to permeate, but creamed entrees, salads, baking of the sort referred to and various appetizing scalloped entrees may be prepared by aid of a chafing dish and a little oven of the sort. These small ovens may be used on electric grills also and rare is the woman who does not enjoy an occasional "cooking fest."

RECORD BELL RINGER.

South Bend (Ind.) Sexton Pulled at Rate of 755 Miles In Seventeen Years.

South Bend, Ind.—Seventeen years as sexton at St. Patrick's Catholic church in this city, pulling the rope on the great bell at the church more than 750 miles in that time, is the unusual record which has just been completed by Charles S. Schubert.

He has rung the bell for practically 7,900 services. He has averaged one service a day through the year and three times on Sunday, making an annual total of 429 services.

In addition to this, Schubert has rung the bell three times a day for the angelus. For each service he rings the bell twice. He averages ringing the bell six times on week days and nine on Sunday. Therefore in a year, averaging twenty-five strokes to the pull for the 2,346 times he rings the bell annually, he would give the bell 56,650 strokes. Now, in each pull he jerks the rope four feet, making 234,600 feet annually, or 3,988,200 feet, or 755½ miles in seventeen years.

GRANDPA OF WOLVES.

Caught by a Wisconsin Sheriff at Twin Lakes Weighed 119 Pounds.

Rhinelander, Wis.—The largest timber wolf ever seen in the county was trapped by Deputy Sheriff Andrew Anderson near Twin Lakes.

The deputy brought the animal's body to Gagen, where he had it on display for several days. Mr. Anderson, who has trapped for forty years and has captured more wild animals than almost any man in the state, declares that he has never before seen a wolf anywhere near as large.

Weighing 119 pounds, the body measured six feet from the end of the nose to the tip of the tail. The animal was three feet in height and had been caught in a trap before, the right forefoot having been clipped off.

Ferdinand's Crown.

The king of Bulgaria has a crown that he has never worn in public. In 1902 "Prince" Ferdinand thought the time ripe for proclaiming himself king and ordered a diadem from Brussels. The "concert of Europe" ordained otherwise, and the crown was relegated to a cupboard until 1908, when the prince was elevated to kingship. Austria, however, prohibited Ferdinand's coronation, so that he has not yet worn the crown publicly.

January Relishes.

AN APPETIZER WORTH WHILE.—A cold cooked beet or a hard boiled egg when minced very fine and added to a French salad dressing will give quite a "company look" to an otherwise plain salad, while a bit of cottage cheese and a minced olive or two, together with a "left over" sardine, the whole moistened with mayonnaise and spread on round biscuits or bits of toasted bread, make an appetizer worthy of 1916.

Sardines In Aspic.—A small bread pan is a good mold for this dish. Set in a pan of cracked ice and water, pour in liquid aspic to form a thin layer and upon this lay a row of sardines, each in a bed of finely chopped parsley. Fix each in place with a few drops of liquid jelly, then cover with jelly, and when this is firm arrange upon it another row of sardines and cover with jelly as before.

Tomato Jelly.—Three-quarters box of gelatin (scant), three-quarters cupful cold water, a can tomatoes, one-half onion, stalk celery, two tablespoonfuls tarragon vinegar, two cloves, a bay leaf, few grains cayenne. Soften the gelatin five minutes in cold water. Cook together the other ingredients, except the vinegar, ten minutes, add the vinegar and softened gelatin and stir until dissolved, then strain. Pour into a mold and set in a cool place or on ice to form. When cold turn from the mold, garnish with crisp lettuce leaves and pour mayonnaise dressing over the whole.

Cheese Rolls.—A most delicious surprise in the place of sandwiches to serve with coffee or chocolate is made with the aid of whipped cream and cheese. Make some light, tender, raised rolls, shaped long and narrow. When they are cold cut off the tops of the rolls and remove some of the center. Just before serving take a small jar of cheese and cream it with a quarter as much butter and fold into a half cupful of cream whipped stiff. Fill the rolls and replace the covers.

Cheese Fondue.—Needed, one-quarter pound of grated cheese, two eggs, quarter pint white sauce, pepper, salt and mustard.

To make prepare the sauce, add the cheese and yolks of the eggs, also the seasonings. Beat the whites stiffly and stir gently into the mixture. Place in a well buttered pie dish and bake for fifteen minutes.

THIS costume, so entirely English in contour, is fashioned of black satin lavishly braided. The style is markedly mid-Victorian, and the Russian cross of its corsage shows what a pretty compliment the English can pay their ally. Even the turban takes a Russian tilt, and its deep fur band matches the muff, which is built on more spacious lines than are muffs this side of the pond.

Effective Frock In Blue Crepe Meteor.

For the season to come this frock in blue crepe meteor trimmed with black is designed.

For a soft, dainty frock that is appropriate for almost any occasion, the accompanying model is highly recommended. Blue crepe meteor is used for its construction, the trimming bands being in black.

To make the waist, first tuck the front by creasing on slot perforations and stitch as deep as desired. Turn the hem on double "oo" perforations, the center-front being indicated by large "O" perforations. Close underarm and shoulder seams as notched, gather at the lower edge and sew stay to lower edge of waist, center-backs even, small "o" perforations at underarm seam; then bring the front edge to center-front. Gather the jabot between double "TT" perforations, sew gathered edge along center-front of left front and along neck edge, matching the single and double small "oo" perforations. Close the collar seam and sew to neck edge as notched.

Now, gather the sleeve between double "TT" perforations and close seam as notched, leaving extensions free; turn under extension on slot perforations, lap to small "o" perforations. Sew sleeve in armhole as notched.

The side seams of gores and yokes of the skirt are now closed as notched. Gather upper edges between double "TT" perforations. Sew gores to lower edges of yokes, notches, center-fronts, center-backs and seams even, and if desired, insert a corded piping in seam. Stitch a bias 3-inch band to position on gores as illustrated, upper edge along small "o" perforations. Turn hem in right front gore and right front yoke on double "oo" perforations; lap on left front yoke and left front gore centers even (large "O" perforations indicate center-front); stitch to position leaving edges free above single large "O" perforation in front gore for placket. Sew to lower edge of waist over stay, center-fronts and backs even, side seam at large "O" perforation in stay. Adjust belt, closing in front.

A soft girdle of black to match the bands which trim the frock is an effective finish for the waist.

DOMESTIC BLISS.

Shown In the Confessions of a Happily Married Man.

It takes my wife a long time to read anything. I skim whole pages instantly. She hates to be read aloud to. I love it.

When we travel I always suggest to her in advance the car we shall take. She agrees, but will suddenly change her mind and insist upon taking another one. I grumble to myself and obey. She likes the top of the auto up. I loathe it up. It remains up.

I always praise her golf, no matter how badly she plays. She always deprecates mine, no matter how well I play. When I criticise anything she does I don't say it; I think it. That sometimes makes trouble enough.

I compliment her occasionally before others. She pretends that she doesn't understand why I do it.

When I buy a new suit she will never admit that she admires it until it is worn out. Then she says the next one isn't half so becoming as the last. When she gets a new gown I admire it intensely until it is about time to replace it with another. She never liked any hat that I have ever bought. I like every one of hers—on principle.

I laugh at her when she gets too serious. When I get too serious she scolds me.

I keep her informed about my business only when she asks me. She never asks me, so you know the result.

I tell her a funny story every day. If I have two I keep one for the next day. Sometimes she laughs at them.

She asks me occasionally if I think her hair is as long as it was. I always tell her it is longer.

I hate bridge, dinner parties, dancing and the opera. She respects my opinion and makes me do them all.

She makes out checks and forgets to enter them on the stubs. Every time I catch her in this omission she reminds me of the celebrated occasion when I left the tickets to a large theater party in my other suit.

She always keeps her temper when I lose mine. I keep mine when she loses hers.

I once told her she was thoroughly spoiled. She kissed me and said she knew it.—Life.

Japanese Bird Pets.

The uguisu is the favorite bird pet of the Japanese, says the East and West News, and it is called the Japanese nightingale by virtue of its fine singing qualities. It is not remarkable for its beauty, but it has a reputation for needing a great deal of attention. It must be fed on specially prepared food—fresh water fish, green vegetables and bread, the whole being ground together and baked. The birds are divided into five grades according to excellence in singing and command prices ranging from 50 cents to $500.

FOR THE BALL.

In Contrast to the Plain Exterior and Gay Linings.

A GRACEFUL BACK.

This evening wrap is fashioned of coral colored brocade velvet, showing a fascinating Japanese pattern in fans and flowers. Below its scalloped bottom falls a straight band of satin in a weirdly oriental tone of blue. The neck is finished in gray fox. Reversing fashion's dictum of gay linings, this wrap wears its gorgeousness outside, being lined with a dull white satin.

CARE OF CLOTHES.

Slip Your Garments on a Hanger Instead of a Chair Back.

Never leave your suits or dresses lying on a chair or on the bed rail, but put a hanger in them the minute you take them off. It is simply a matter of habit, and it is just as easy to learn to slip a hanger into your coat and put it in the closet at once as it is to throw it on a chair, to hang up later. Creases and wrinkles wear out the cloth, and the only way to keep your clothes free of wrinkles is to hang them up when you remove them.

Shoes, too, retain their shape much longer if trees are kept in them. You can always tell the shoes which are neglected by their wrinkled, shapeless look. It is a matter of a moment or two to slip shoe trees into your boots when you take them off, and this will prevent the leather from relaxing. Footgear which has no acquaintance with shoe trees usually splits and cracks just twice as quickly as the well cared for variety. If you will rub a little vaseline into your shoes when new it will prevent the damp and wet from splitting the leather.

When your tailored skirts become wet from the rain do not let them stay wrinkled, but press them with a hot iron before they become dry. By the way, it is a real economy to invest in a good, durable raincoat, because it will protect your suits and frocks to a great extent and will actually save you money.

Wicker Hampers.

A wicker hamper is perhaps the ideal laundry container. But it must be kept clean. One enameled white looks so clean that it is hard to remember that it may harbor impurities, even germs. It must be washed in hot water occasionally and dried in the sunshine, and then sometimes it can be further refreshed with a clean coat of enamel.

Perhaps the ideal method is to have a sunny, dry laundry and there to gather the soiled clothes. Everything damp, like bath towels, should be spread out on a washable wooden or metal rack and dried each day, then placed in a basket or hamper. The clothes should not be piled together pellmell. Table linen should be kept by itself in a separate hamper. Household linen can be kept in another and clothes in a third.

Mock Bisque Soup.

Cook a can of tomatoes with a tablespoonful of sugar and an onion cut in slices half an hour. Add half a teaspoonful of soda and pass through a sieve. Make a white sauce of half a cupful of butter, half a cupful of flour and a quart of milk. When boiling stir in the hot tomato, season to taste and serve at once. Made in this manner, if the fresh tomatoes are not over ripe or the canned goods too old, the soda may be omitted without danger of curdling.

RUSSIA LOSSES HEAVY IN MAKING FOURTEEN ATTACKS ON ONE DAY

London—While the complete fall of Czernowitz, the capital of Bukowina, has not yet been officially confirmed, an Austrian dispatch to The Hague states that the troops of Franz Josef have evacuted part of the city.

Meanwhile fighting of an almost unexampled ferocity is going on along the Bessarabian-Galician frontiers.

In an assault east of Baraneze, the Russians advanced in eight successive lines of attack. The Austrians claim to have inflicted tremendous losses on thesed ense formation of Russian troops.

A dipatch to a Berlin newspaper from the Bukowima front discribes the fighting there since Christmas Day as unexampled.

The Russian have concentrated more than 200 guns and three divisions of infantry on a front of three-quarters of a mile.

The battle reached its height on December 28, when the Russians attacked fourteen times and there was furious hand to hand fighting.

Czernowitz lies in a deep valley. The town itself is not of great strategical value, except for its railroads. Its faill is likely to have greater political than military significance, as an outstanding success by the Russians at this time would be likely to have a far-reaching effect on Rumanian.

The Austrian Special says: —

"Russian War Theatre—In East Galicia and on the Kukowina frontier our troops at all points were victorious again yesterday. On the Bessarabja front during the first hours of the afternoon the Russians again opened a very strong artillery fire.

"Once more an infantry attack was directed against our positions near Torporoutz, and at the frontier of the empire east of Raraneze the Russians at some points advanced in eight lines of attack close to our position. Their columns collapsed before our obstacles, but a majority of them already had suffered great losses.

"The Croation and South Hungarian regiments distinguished themselves in the tenacious resistance under most difficult conditions."

IRELAND IS EXCLUDED BY PROVISIONS OF MR. ASQUITH'S BILL

London—The long awaited measure to compel military service by single men was presented to the House of Commons yesterday by the Premier, Mr. Asquith, in an address in which he reviewed the results of the Derby recruiting campaign and expressed the hope that even before the measure, if passed, could become efective the need for it would have disappeared by the voluntary enlistment of the shirkers.

The text of the bill followed very closely the outlines of it cabled to the Herald. Ireland is excluded from its operations— a clause concerning which there was some doubt up to the hour of its introduction in Commons.

While Mr. Asquith was explaining the provisions of the measure to the House Lord Kitchener was telling the House of Lords that its adoption was necessary to the maintenance of a great army in the field and giving his assurance to the country that it is a temporary and not a permanent change in the life of the nation, to last only with the war.

Little doubt is expressed in Parliament or in the clubs and hotels concerning the ability of the government to swing a favorable vote for its bill, but it is generally recognized that much bitterness will develop before it becomes law. The attitude or organized labor is a cause of extreme anxiety. The great trades union conference to be held here today will speak the labor verdict, and Robert Williams, leader of the important Transport Workers' Federation, declared last night:

"It is practically assured that the conference will affirm the rejection of conscription in any form. The bill is being improperly pushed through the House. Many officers have trooped back from the front to vote down those who stick to their principles. I do not know how long this government of shreds and tatters is going to last, but it can't last long. I would sooner see a tory government in power than a Cabinet which declares unbounded devotion to voluntarism while cutting the throat of voluntarism."

RUSSIA SEES BREAK IN LINES OF POWERS

London—While the battle on the borders of Bessarabia is apparently still far from a decision, each day finds the Russians laying claim to the occupation of additional enemp positions, and Petrograd believes that if this process continues a short time longer a break somewhere in the lines of the Central Powers must come. The whole energy of the Russian army is being directed to making a gap between the German armies in the center and the southern Austrian forces, and the desparate Austrian attacks in the region of Kolki ared esigned to prevent this. The fighting must continue for a considerable time yet, but upon the result will depend in large measure the strategy of both sides when spring comes.

LIQUOR QUESTION AT ALBANY

One of the questions which will receive more or less attention during the legislative session which began today is that concerning the sale of liquor. At least threed ifferent measures will come before the law-makers. The principal one is promoted by the Anti-Saloon League of New York, which claims it is supported by all the temperance elements except the Prihibition party, which insists upon dealing with the liquor question on a partisan basis and which has decided to introduce a rigid statewide prohibition bill of its own.

This measure of the Anti-Saloon League is ar evision of a bill which has previously been before the Legislature and provides that the selling of liquor within certain population units shall be decided by the voters These units are described as follows:

1. Any election district (the smallest regular voting unit) in a city of the first or second class (50,000 or over), or combination of adjoining districts which may be united in one petition to cover a homegenerous residential neighborhood.
2. Any village in a wet town.
3. Any town (township).
4. Any city, large or small.
5. Any county having no city of the first or second class or an eitire county, exclusive of any city or cities of the first or second class.
6. The entire state as a whole.

Mayor Mitchel of New York is said to favor the election-district local-option feature. Paragraph two provides that a village in a pro-license town may decide the liquor question for itself. It is also provided in the bill that when the people of any political division have cast three straight dry votes, or allowed the time for a third vote to go by without contest, prohibition shall be considered the settled policy of such unit. Dr. Lyman Abbott's Outlook magazine is quoted as favoring the bill.

Liquor men also are to introduce a measure, calculated, as the Anti-Saloon League phrases it, "to ease up the pressure of public sentiment for the optional prohibition referendum bill." This measure is an amendment to the Raines law giving cities of the third class the local option privilege.

HELEN KELLER SPOKE FOR PEACE IN N. Y.

New York—Miss Helen Keller was received with enthusiasm last night by a large audience, mainly composed of women, which crowded Carnegie Hall to listen to speeches against militarism and preparedness — which weer treated by most of the speakers as anonymous terms. The meeting was under the auspices of the Women's Peace Party and a special committee of the Labor Forum.

When Miss Keller advanced to the front of the platform she was cheered for fifteen minutes. Women stood up up in the audience and waved their randkerchiefs and shouted and applauded until they were tired. Miss Keller showed by her expression that she realized what was going on, although she could neither see nor hear. When the applause ceased she spoke in low tones to a young man who immediately addressed the audience in a clear, resonant oice, repeating, sentence for sentence, all that Miss Keller had to say. Her address lasted an hour and ten minutes. She emphasized some of her points with gestures and only twice was she prompted from notes she had prepared.

She spoke of thec onquest of the United States by invasion from over the seas as "a nightmare" and said that fear of it was "confirmed to warmad persons, like Colonel Roosevelt."

"In thep rimitive days," she said, "men fought because they wanted to eat their enemies or steal their women and wives, but nowadayls they fight for possession and acquisition of other peoples' property.

"If Congress asks us to prepare for a war of freedom, we would have no objection. I am not opposed to wars for human freedom and liberty, because we working men and women are willing to fight for freedom."

"If the Mikado ever purposed to invade our country and he commandered every possible craft within his scope of influence hec ould only bring over 41,000 men and it would take him six weeks to do it. I think that our friends and countrymen on the Pacific coast are able to take care of 41,000 men before the ships could return to Japan and bring over 41,000 more.

"Should Germany attempt the same thing after she had advanced to first place among the nations of the earth she could do but little better than Japan. My feminine mind is struck by the idea that if we could not take care of 40,000 German soldiers and save the country and its peo ple we would not be worth saving.

"Your masters have taken from you your right and they now appeal to you to fight for their right on the seas. You would be fools to fight for their irghts on land or sea for them when they never give you any right either on land or sea."

In closing Miss Keller implored the audience to form one gigantic workingmen's union.

Miss Keller was greeted with cheers at thec lose of her address.

GOVERNOR ASKS FO R RILEY'S RESIGNATION

Ossining—State Superintendent of Prisons Rley arrived here from Albany today and immediately went to Sing Sing prison and held a conference with Warden George W. Kirckway. Superintendent Riley also intended to make a tour of the prison. A number of vital changes in personnel are expected as a result of his visit. This is the first time he has been here since last March.

The action of Governor Whitman in requesting the resignation of Superintendent Riley is based upon an order made by the Superintendent which resulted in the transfer of sixty-six convicts from Sing Sing prison to Dannemora.

SUNDAY'S OHIO CITY GET UNDER WAGON

Steubenville, O.—This city, which went dry in 1911, following a revival held by Billy Sunday, has returned to the wet fold with a maiority of 271 votes out of a total of 4,653 votes cast,

The election overturned a dry regime in the city for the second time in the last ten years.

STATE ACTION WOULD DEPRIVE CITY OF WATER

ter from Spring No. 3 was somewhat polluted by seepage from the high water and it was advised that the buildings near these springs be purchased and removed and the springs be properly fenced to prevent animals getting near to leave their droppings. This recommendation I would advise especially so far as the barn and outside closet are concerned to be accepted.

The State has made its recommendations for the second time. No move has been made by the Board to comply with the recommendations. It is my opinion that if some move is not made by the city the State will cut out Springs No. 3 and 4 from use by the city.

I would very strongly recommend that the city obtain an option on the Tilden Spring now while it is possible. It is good water and will furnish more water than any spring owned by the city at present and it is near the main pipe so that the cost of connecting would be only for the sinking of the caison.

I think that I can say that there is not another city of this size in the state which can claim a purer water supply. The Health board of this city has adopted the Sanitary code of the State as a part of the laws of the city. One section of this code requires that all houses situated on streets with sewers must have inside toilets connected with the sewers and must do away with all outside closets. Considerable trouble has arisen in the enforcement of this statute because these facts are not generally known. I recommend that the entire section of thec ode relating to the outhouses and to garbage be published for a certain period in the newspapers. If this is done it will be possible for the health officer to enforce this law during the coming Spring and all danger of thep ublic health from these nuisances, as they now exist, will be removed. The healthofficer will hold all owners of property responsible for the condition of their property and theo wners, not the tenants, are responsible. Each tenant must be provided with a proper receptacle for garbage so that the grounds may be easily kept clean and sanitary.

Youngstown Guarded by State and Regular Troops—More Riots

Youngstown, Ohio—Three men are dead, nineteen were shot, four probably fatally; six city blocks have been burned, with a loss estimated at $800,000, and rioters hold the town as the result of a battle early last evening between a mob of six thousand and a force of special police guarding the steel mills here, where a strike is in progress.

The rioters stole about 500 pounds of dynamite later in the evening and have dynamited several houses, it is reported. The bridge from East Youngstown to Struthers was burned to prevent rioters from entering the town.

Two companies of United States regulars from Columbus are reported to have been ordered to East Youngstown because of the looting and burning of the post office.

Sheriff J. C. Umstead has requested that State troops be sent and Governor Willias late last night ordered three regiments of the Ohio National Guard to the scene. The men left Cleveland at midnight. The Governor, through the State liquor license commission, has ordered all saloons in Mahoning and Trumbull counties closed until further orders. Niles and Warren are in Trumbull country, where, it is feared, the strike wilerspld. nam CLv I- w2oj feared, that the strike will spread. Company K of Alliance, of the Ohio National Guard, is expected to arrive here momentarily.

Early this morning the strikers at East Youngstown had seized the company hospital and were barricading themselves in it preparatory to an attack by them embers fo the Ohio National Guard, who are on the way with machine guns.

The fire still rages and the department members have given up attempts to stop it, as strikers are shooting at them. Oneb ig bank in East Youngstown is in ruins, a jewelry store has been looted of many valuables and the postoffice was looted and the mail destroyed. There are several hundreds of men in the offices and buildings of the mills who are working to keep the fires going, many of the men being high salaried officials and their relatives.

Sheriff Umstead, Adjutant General Hough and other National Guard officers, who went to East Youngstown, were attacked by a mob. Red pepper was thrown into the Sheriff's eyes and he was badly beaten. Conviction grows that the strike was inspired by interests trying to close industrial plants manufacturing war supplies for use in Europe.

The fire companies which attempted to check the flames in the East Youngstown business district were beaten off by the mob. Many shots were fired, but the firemen got safely back to Youngstown.

Two of the three men killed met their death in a fight among rioters in a saloon. All of the nineteen injured persons were taken to hospitals here.

East Youngstown, which has a population of about ten thousand, tonight is the scene of great disorder. The police, being helplessly outnumbered, made no effort to control the mobs which surged through the streets and threatened to burn down the town. Most of the residents are foreigners.

All through the day there was trouble in the vicinity of the sheet and tubem ills in the suburbs. The rioting started early yesterday morning, when the day shift, the few employes left in the plant, started to work. Later in the afternoon two men were seriously injured in riots near the mills and shots were fired at some of the mill buildings.

GERMANY AGREES TO GUARD LIVES OF PASSENGERS

Washington—Secretary Lansing has made public the following:—

"The German Ambassador today left at the Department of State under instruction from his government the following communication:

"'1.—German submarines in the Mediterranean had from the beginning orders to conduct cruiser warfare against enemy merchant vessels only in accordance with general principles of international law, and in particular measures of reprisal, as applied in the war zone around the British Isles, were to be excluded.

"'2.—German submarines are, therefore, permitted to destroy enemy mercant vessels in the Mediterranean—i. e., passenger as well as freight ships, as far as they do not try to escape or offer resistance—only after passengers and crews have been accorded safety.

"'3.—All cases of destruction of enemy merchant ships in the Mediterranean in which German submarines are concerned are made the subject of official investigation and, besides, submitted to regular prize court proceedings. In so far as American interests are concerned, the German government will communicate the result to the American government. Thus also in the Persia case if the circumstances should call for it.

"'4.—If commanders of German submarines should not have obeyed the orders given to them they will be punished; furthermore, the German government will make reparation for damages caused by death or injuries to American citizens.'"

England May Employ Referendum to Pass Conscription Bill

London.—The political situation yesterday was calmer after the overwhelming vote cast for the government in the House of Commons on Thursday night on the first reading of its compulsion bill.

The reassuring size of theg overnment's majority of the lower house of Parliament offset to a considerable degree the anti-conscriptionist vote of the Labor Congress, which also was partly discounted by the attitude of such important labor leaders as Mr. Arthur Henderson, who resiggned as president of the Board of Education, and Colonel John Ward, Mr. George Nicoll Barnes nad Mr. John Hodge, members of the House of Commons.

The position of these men is that the vote of the Labor Congress was too hasty and ill considered to be regarded as reflecting the actual feeling of thel abor men of thec ountry.

Parliament did not meet yesterday and will not sit again until Monday. The indications are that the conscription bill will be passed through the House of oCmmons in order that it may reach the House of Lords in ample time for passage before the end of the month.

In some quarters talk of a general election still persists but it is certain that a considerable part of even the opponents of compulsion do not want to resort to the ballot.

Much is hoped from ther eopening of Lord Derby's recruiting scheme. The Daily Chronicle expresses the belief that the Premier's conscription bill will under go some modifications in its committee stage which will alleviate the situation. The Daily Chronicle asserts however that should the bll. meet with serious obstruction in committee the Premier would dissolve Parliament.

Much dissension and bitterness prevails in thel abor party as a result of Thursday's Labor Congress proceedings. The Daily Express prints an interview with Mr. George H. Roberts, who resigned as Lord Commissioner of the Treasury. Mr. Roberts thinks that a general election is theo nly means of settling the opinion of the coun-

Berlin Breakdown in Balkins Indicates Peace With 2 Nations

Paris—A radical change in the German strategy has already begun to take effect in the Balkans. It involves the first official admission of a breakdown in the campaign against France and Russia.

The change is indicated by reports reaching Paris from Switzerland which are credited in man yquarters here.

Prince Hohenlohe, disguising his identity with the title "Count Kraft," is the Kaiser's chief commissioner with Prince Buelow in Switzerland.

They are working for a separate peace with France and Russia, which owuld leave Germany's hand free to combat Great Britain's steadily growing military strength.

As regards the Eastern front, plans for a renewed anti-Russian offensive early in the Spring have been dropped, according to the Swiss stories, because, with the dwindling of effective opposing Russia's swelling man-pawer. Germany's chances of a decisive triumph are not great enough to justify the carnage a new onslaught against the Muscovites would bring.

Such an offensive was put beyond the range of possibility when the Franco-British expeditionary forces got safely within the Saloniki lines and the French Premier. M. Briand, swung the British round to the policy of using thep ort as the starting point for an ultimate Balkan offensive.

WHY GOVERNMENT SHOULD OWN RAILROADS

In its very nature, a railroad is a public utility. It cannot possibly carry on a PRIVATE business.

The rajroads must carry the first-class mails, which is a Government function as purely as is the coinage of money.

The railroads are the only military highways, under modern conditions of troop and supply transportation—that gives them a purely Government character.

The railroads must carry the parcel post, and the really desirable economic effects of this service can never be had until the Government owns the carrying roads.

The values of all the crops and domestic animals an manufactures—the whole annual wealth product of the people—depend entirely upon the factor of transportation.

The farther products can be shipped in all directions and the cheaper long hauls become, the more profitable become the products of farms and factories.

The more profitable farm and factory products become the more wages increase and business prospers.

And the only owner who can afford to cheapen the longer hauls and to build extensions and feeders without cash profit is the Government.

This is so because the Government can afford to build up industries and production in new directions at a temporary loss because increased sources of taxation and revenue will more than make up for the deficits incurred at first by building the railroad extensions that start the new industries.

This factor private ownership cannot figure upon, And so many millions of acres go unused because no one will build developing railroads to them.

As a matter of-fact, the country is now on the verge of am ost serious economic situation because the increase of railroad facilities has not kept up with the increase of production.

The productionof the United States increases pretty regularly about 13 per cent. per year.

The railroad facilities have not increased anything like that during the past five years, unless something radical is done, we shall have a breakdown of the carrying system, with goods piling up in warehouses and crops rotting in the fields. And that spells panic and disaster.

Some railroad presidents and directors are honest. And some are as dishonest as they dare be—with very little that they are afraid to dare.

As long as the menace of possible dishonesty hangs over the INVESTORRS in railroads so long will it be difficult to raise the constantly increasing sums necessary to better existing lines and to create needed new lines.

The only hope of remedying this more and more menacing difficulty is to take the whole business of transportation out of private control and put it in public control.

When railroad securities are Government securities, there will be no trouble to market among American investors as many millions worth as need to be sold.

Government ownership of railroads would automatically stabilize the values of securities, provide absolutely safe investment for surplus funds, increase the area of producing acreage ,increase thep rofits of farm and factory production, increase exchange and merchandising, raise wages and lessen unemployment.—N. Y. American.

LET'S DISPOSE—

The prospect of our city enjoying modern garbarge collection and disposal is hailed with delight by all care-about it persons in the city. Here is struck one of the true notes of modern civilization.

The problem of efficient garbage collection and disposal has undoubtedly "got the goat" of more cities in the country than has that still remained a problem. However, some system is better than no to realize efficient service in this line, but of no avail; the problem still remained a probles. However, some system is better than no system. Perhaps the best plan would be to impose a high fine, or better yet, a few days' vacation at the city's jail for anyone failing to provide themselves with proper garbage receptacles and observing the correct use of the same. Too many people in the city last summer endured the evil odors arising from the non-disposal of garbage in neighboring yards. Swarms of flies and legions of mosquitoes sang aloft their songs of exulation as the playful little zephyrs wafted to and fro nameless compounds.

In cities, persons cannot live to themselves alone. One family in a neighborhood, who do not observe even the plainest of unfrilled niceties of living, can make life miserable, day and night, for scores of other people. What's the use of planting roses and keeping a bottle of Florida water on the pantry shelf when over "the garden wall" there's something very wrong?

A city flaunting ash heaps, tin can hills, and ungathered garbage is a sorry place for cleanly folks to live in.

Mother Fulton chirk up! Clean house, and set your yard in order.

ADVERSITY DEVELOPS MEN

Times are never as black as we are prone to paint them; neither are they ever as good. There are men inclined to look continually on the dark side of things, and when the going gets hard, overwhelmed by the seeming difficulties to be met, quit. There are others who profess to believe that everything is lovely, and that the talk of subnormal conditions is nothing more or less than a pessimistic view of the situation. Neither is this right. No man can do himself or his company any good by simply expressing such a belief. In the face of a real tough situation—and such a condition confronts us—we must recognize it as such, and then extend ourselves to take care of it.

We grow by adversity. In the face of a crisis men have developed latent abilities, which they never knew they possessed. Cold, hard necessity has forced men to accomplishments which they had formerly believed impossible, and made them stronger, better men, through confidence created by what they had done.

We should feel thankful that we are confronted with the necessity of developing our resources to the last ditch; because when confidence is restored in all lines of business, we will be better equipped and better prepared to carry on the conquest of future years with a new mark set. Through facing altered conditions, and conquering them, we will have gained a new following; because, our change in plans, methods, and added energy to keep up normal results at this time will have so expanded us that when the selection comes for the survival of the fittest, we will be so firmly established that our position will be well-nigh impregnable.

Let us face conditions as they are, and having the facts, shape our work in accordance with the necessities of dealing with them. The remedy for subnormal conditions is not philosophy, but added effort in the right direction, by catering to existing conditions and, thereby, getting a bigger share of business. We can continue to move ahead if every man gets at the real facts and plugs.—A. M. Taylor, Rochester.

WITH THE SUFFRAGIST

The Attorney General of Illinois has decided that women are not entitled to vote for delegates to Presidential Conventions, in spite of their being eligible to vote for he candidates nominated.

Congressmen from equal suffrage states give their services without stint toward securing the vote for Eastern women. A case in point is the introduction by Senator Lane of Oregon and Representative Helvering of Kansas of bills to give women the right to vote for members of Congress.

They owuld hardly lend their influence, so runs the suffragist's comment, to help spread a political experiment that had failed in their own states.

In Oklahoma, a judge has rendered the opinion that whether a woman shall dance or not depends, not on her ability orw ishes, but on the wishes of her husband, and he accordingly denied the plea for divorce made by a woman whose husband tried to enforce his wishes with physical force.

In Selma, California, Mrs. Florence Scott has announced her candidacy for the unexpired term in the state assembly in order that she may carry out the policies of her husband whose death created thev acancy.

Out of 7925 children arrested for delinquency in New York city last year, 2½ per cent. were girls which is another sign of the extent of the menace of the bad woman vote.

That New York women in the recent campaign asked for the vote in 24 different languages was part of the testimony produced before the U. S. Senate Committee in proof that women had sufficiently proved their desire for the ballot.

Over ten thousand suffrage meetings in six months; 7½ million leaflets printed, using 20 tons of paper; 20,000 women marching in one city parade; over 6,000 women watching at the polls on election days; these are the trenchant items of the official statement of the votes for women campaign in the Empire State in the year nineteen hundred and fifteen.

LITTLE TALKS ON THRIFT

By S. W. STRAUS
President American Society for Thrift

"Save, young man, and become respectable and respected," said Benjamin Franklin. "It is the quickest and surest way."

To find out whether these words are true or not, begin to save. A person will be astonished at how much he will grow in his own self-esteem, and his attitude of self-respect will compel respect from others. Select some solid citizen of your neighborhood who is known to have made and saved money. Observe the assurance with which he walks the streets and the confidence with which he meets people; also how he is looked-up-to by others. Truly Benjamin Franklin spoke wisely.

It is very much easier to make than to save money. Nearly everyone makes money, be it much or little, but those who make little think only those who make much can save. Now anyone can save if he will. The trouble is a dime looks so small. It is only ten pennies of ten cents and ten cents is almost nothing. It is hardly missed. Yet one little ten cent piece saved every day for ten days means a dollar and each dollar set to earning for you, the earlier in life the better, will surprise you at the end of a period of time by its industry.

A good way to create the saving habit is to determine to save a dime every day—even a nickel or a cent, in the case of a very small pay envelope. Make almost any sacrifice to save the sum you have set out to save. Or another rather enticing form of thrift is to save every dime you get, or every nickel or every penny—no matter how many you get in a day. You will soon have a dollar, then ten dollars and finally it will get to be a hundred dollars and you will feel quite a capitalist. By this time you will have journeyed far on the way to thrift and you will find it not a hard road. Be sure of one thing. You will never have anything unless you save something. You cannot eat your cake and have it, too.

The same might be said regarding this country and the waste of its natural resources. According to the scientific report of the United States Geological Survey, there is one-half as much coal wasted in America as is marketed. "With regard to petroleum," says the report, "the situation is a good deal more serious. Petroleum has been used for less than thirty years, and it is estimated that the supply will last about twenty-five or thirty years longer. If production is curtailed and waste stopped, it may last till the end of the century. In natural gas the waste is enormous. One hundred million cubic feet are estimated to be wasted into air every twenty-four hours. The gas supply will last about twenty-five years." Wherever we turn we encounter waste. Each individual, however, can help to counteract this thriftless spirit by being careful. Now, at the beginning of the new year, is an opportune time to resolve to become a saver of time, health and money.

PLAN NATIONAL RAILWAY STRIKE

Membership of Big Brotherhoods Voting on Proposal.

WOULD PARALYZE NATION

Labor Organizations Involved Number More Than 400,000 Men—Universal Eight Hour Day and Increase of Wages Objects of Movement—Demand Likely to Be Made Next May.

The 458 railroads of the United States were brought face to face with the eight hour day when executive committees of the four great railroad labor organizations which had been sitting in joint session at Chicago for two weeks formulated demands for a cut to eight hours from the prevailing ten hour day. Time and a half for overtime also will be asked.

Resolutions embodying the demands were mailed to every member of the four brotherhoods on the first of the year for a referendum vote. The membership will have sixty days in which to return the ballots.

If the demands be approved, and chiefs of the several associations say there is no question as to their approval, the executive committees will draw up the demands for submission to the general managers of the railroads.

The last of the contracts of the engineers and firemen and those of the western railroads expire May 11 next, and that is the date mentioned as the probable time for presenting the demands.

The membership of the organizations involved numbers more than 400,000 men. These organizations are back of the campaign for the universal eight hour day: Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, Order of Railroad Conductors and Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. The move is an outgrowth of agitation that has been sweeping over the country for a year and is said to be the greatest labor dispute ever advanced in any occupation.

In the general campaign to bring about the eight hour day action was taken separately by the three divisions—the eastern, southern and western. A joint conference was then held, and the imaginary sectional lines of the employees were wiped out. It is proposed that one settlement be made at the same time between the railroads and all employees in the transportation service.

The movement toward this amalgamation of the eastern, southern and western division of the employees and the resultant demands to be voted on by the membership follow recent arbitration awards in the eastern and western railroad sections.

[illegible] was broadly hinted when the western decision giving the engineers and [illegible] only a small portion of the [illegible] increase asked was announced [illegible] 1, 1915, that the railroad men [illegible] renew their demands in force [illegible] the terms of the award expired. [illegible] 1, 1916.

"[illegible] time I don't think there will [illegible]ration," said Timothy Shea, [illegible] the president of the Brotherhood [illegible] Locomotive Firemen. "Of [illegible] am not qualified to speak au[illegible]ly, but I have had a chance to observe the temper of the men, and it is my belief that they have had enough of so called mediation.

"The principle of arbitration is excellent, but it has been abused. Where the men submitted it has not been productive of the justice for which it was designed.

"As for our intentions in the present case, I do not think there is anything secret about them. We are going to demand flatly an eight hour day and time and a half for overtime. Failing to obtain that, we will walk out and let the discussions come afterward. Every railroad in the United States is affected."

Mr. Shea was a member of the board of arbitration which heard the claims of the employees of the western railroads in Chicago last spring. He and F. A. Burgess, assistant grand chief of the Brotherhood of Engineers, signed a minority report after the men had failed to oust Charles Nagel, former secretary of commerce and labor under President Taft, from the board.

Silver Workers Get Raise.

The recent meeting of those directing the affairs of Rogers & Bro., a branch of the International Silver company, at Waterbury, Conn., ordered a general increase in wages of about 10 per cent for 200 or more employees, and the order calls for the reduction of working time from sixty hours a week to fifty-five, with full pay for sixty hours, thus giving the workers five hours' extra pay. Not long ago the firm was seriously inconvenienced by a strike, and the new rule is designed to appease those who are dissatisfied.

Labor In Porto Rico.

With the largest sugar crop in Porto Rico's history to be harvested and with the grinding season near at hand sugar men are facing serious labor problems. A general demand is being made by Santiago Iglesias, head of the local labor organization and representative in Porto Rico of the American Federation of Labor, for an eight hour day and a dollar wage for all agricultural laborers.

ONE CROP PAID FOR FARM.

Western Kansas Farmer Traded a Calf For Wheat Pasture.

Atchison, Kan.—Albert Armstrong of this city, who has just returned from a trip to Lane county, says the farmers out there are worrying about what to do with their money instead of worrying how to get along for lack of it.

Western Kansas farmers, according to Armstrong, have had a prosperous year. Last spring one Lane county farmer traded a heifer for a piece of volunteer wheat for the purpose of pasturing his cattle on it.

The wheat did so well he decided to let it grow and harvested it. And he harvested 1,300 bushels of wheat, which will be sold for $1,300. Another farmer bought a half section of land for $15 an acre, and the year's crop paid for the land.

SHE HAD A HARD TIME.

Getting a Hubby Was Not So Easy For Chicago Woman.

Chicago.—A cry of "Stop thief!" prevented the escape of a bashful bridegroom here a few days ago. After two years' courtship Steven McBett and Mrs. Marie Alphonso went to the city hall to get a marriage license. Then McBett weakened. As he started toward the street at top speed Mrs. Alphonso screamed:

"Stop thief! He has got my pocketbook!"

McBett was captured by a patrolman and taken to central station, where the woman broke down. "He's not a thief," she confessed. "But I knew if he got away now he'd never get this close again." Later the couple got the license and started for the church.

KILLED 150 RATTLERS.

Thrashing Crew Kept Busy After One Was Found Near Wakeeney, Kan.

Wakeeney, Kan.—A thrashing crew working near this city killed 150 snakes in a few minutes near where they were working recently.

A large rattler was observed by one of the men lying in a low place at the mouth of a hole. He was pulled out and killed, and with him six more, and then others.

For more than a half hour the men worked hard killing snakes, and when there were no more in sight tails were counted and 150 had been killed. The largest one measured six feet four inches, and he had an even dozen rattles.

COMPENSATION FOR WORKMEN

Resume of Recent Legislation In Several States.

IDEA GROWING RAPIDLY

Some of the Loans Passed Provide For Lump Sum Payments Arbitrarily Fixed—Colorado's Statute Most Illiberal In Regard to Temporary Disability—Progress In Safety Laws.

If proof were needed of the rapid growth of the idea of compensation of workmen for injuries received in the course of employment as a substitute for the old liability acts, it would be found in bulletin No. 185, by the bureau of labor statistics of the United States department of labor.

The legislation of the year 1914 included three states—Kentucky, Louisiana and Maryland. One of these laws, that of Kentucky, was declared unconstitutional before it came into operation. That of Maryland superseded an earlier statute reported as unworkable. The new laws of 1915 cover eight states—Colorado, Indiana, Maine, Montana, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Vermont and Wyoming, besides the territories of Alaska and Hawaii. The legislation of 1914 included also a presidential order providing a compensation system for employees of the Panama canal and the Panama railroad, while that of the current year includes a similar order extending the Federal compensation act of 1908 to workmen engaged on or about the government railway in Alaska. With the legislation of these two years, thirty-one states and the territories of Alaska and Hawaii now have compensation laws. A Federal statute covers also about one-fourth of the civilian employees of the United States. All of this legislation has been enacted since 1908, and practically all of the existing legislation in the states since 1910.

Of the new laws of 1914 and 1915 one, that of Wyoming, must be classed as a compulsory insurance law, while those of Maryland and Oklahoma are compulsory compensation laws. In the other states, eight in number, the law permits the employer to elect or reject the compensation act. In case he rejects it, however, he is deprived of the customary defenses under the liability laws.

Some of the newer laws have certain features which are of special interest and worthy of mention. The Oklahoma statute, for example, applies only to cases of normal accidents, while in Wyoming all awards, whether for death or disability, are in the form of lump sum payments arbitrarily fixed by the statute without regard to the earning capacity of the injured person. The Alaska statute also provides for lump sum payments except for temporary disability. Legislation elsewhere has very generally provided for periodical payments graduated according to wage loss, and this method is favored by practically all authorities.

Of the new laws of 1914 and 1915 the Wyoming act is the least liberal, the compensation for death being limited to funeral expenses of $50 and a maximum death benefit of $2,000. In comparison with this the Colorado statute provides for a maximum of $2,500, while the maximum of the Alaska statute is $6,000. In cases of temporary disability the Colorado law is more illiberal than any other, as it provides for no compensation for disabilities not extending beyond three weeks. In the statutes of other states the waiting time has usually been fixed at one or two weeks, no state except Colorado fixing a longer period.

In the legislation of 1914 and 1915 special boards or commissions for administration continue to be preferred, the laws of Alaska and Wyoming being the only ones enacted during 1915 which do not have this provision. In Maine, Maryland, Oklahoma and Vermont the administrative authorities are given no powers other than those relating to the administration of the compensation acts. In Hawaii county boards with functions restricted to the compensation act are provided for. In Louisiana the law is administered by the courts.

The prevention of accidents as well as compensation is provided for in a number of the new laws. Thus the industrial commission of Colorado is charged not only with the administration of the compensation act, but also with the duty of factory and mine inspection, the enforcement of woman and child labor laws and safety laws generally. Corresponding provisions are found also in the laws of Indiana and Montana.

Promise of future progress in compensation legislation is found in the provision for a commission in Utah for the purpose of drafting a compensation bill and in the amendments to the constitutions of two or three states the purpose of which is to permit the enactment of more inclusive and effective laws than is believed possible under the present laws of the states.

NO DRY BATTERIES.

They All Contain Moisture or They Would Be Useless.

So called dry batteries are in common use for small electric call bell systems and private telephone lines and were used extensively for ignition on earlier makes of automobiles. Applying the word "dry" to the battery is misleading, for there is no such thing as a "dry" battery. There never was, nor will there ever be.

If it were dry no current would generate, as it requires moisture to produce chemico-electric activity when the circuit is completed from the plus to the minus elements.

The so called dry battery is really an "inclosed wet battery," which retains its moisture to its limit of life, whether in service or not. The limit of life depends on the stored capacity, how frequently the circuit is applied to it, evaporation due to age and deterioration of the conducting elements.

The battery consists of a zinc cylinder case containing a carbon in the center, the intervening space filled in with a paste compound of one part zinc oxide, one part sal ammoniac, three parts plaster of paris and two parts water. The quantities are greater as the capacity of the battery is increased.

As soon as a circuit is completed a chemical combination is started, and the current flows from the internal part of the zinc to the carbon, then out from the carbon to the appliance and returns to the zinc. The external terminals of the battery are the reverse of the internal.

When the battery is exhausted it can be recharged by sending current into it from a close circuit battery, such as a nitric or sulphuric acid cell. Pouring water through a small hole at the top of the battery is an aid to the return of its life, but neither this nor the former will restore the battery to its original efficiency.—New York World.

COLUMBIA CIRCLE HAS GOOD TIME

Mrs. Parker Retires Af er Serving Two Years---Good Time Enjoyed by Ladies of G. A. R.

No matter how interesting may be ceremonies incidental to the work of installing officers, there is a sameness which makes the work a dry task, more or less. Recognizing this point the members of Columbia Circle, Ladies of the G. A. R., resolved to relieve dull cove by giving a dinner at Hotel Lewis. The date was set for last night and a happy evening ensued for everybody. When the members of the Circle and their guests had finished the meal the work of installation under the guidance of Mrs. Jennie Graves of Watertown, Past Department President, was begun. During the evening, Mrs. Parker, the retiring President, was presented with a star, emblem of the order. The act was in recognition of the faithful work performed during her administration of two years. Mrs. Parker made fitting response and in turn presented the Circle with a beautiful specimen of Old Glory. Mrs. Parker reported the Circle to be in a flourishing condition. Miss Thelma Parker and Miss Rear furnished the program of music.

The officers installed were as follows:

Mrs. May L. Hammond, president; Miss Eva Palmer, senior vice president; Mrs. Guernsey, junior vice president; Mrs. Battles, secretary; Mrs. Cora Hill, treasurer; Mrs. Dora Drury chaplain; Mrs. Maude Ouderkirk, conductress; Mrs. Jessie Waugh, assistant conductress; Mrs. Ottman, guard; Mrs. Rear, assistant guard.

MOTOR FEDERATION SEEKINF INFORMATION

Gasoline prices have doubled within [illegible] ere is any just cause for this raise in price, Franklin Lane of the Department of Agriculture at Washington is going to find out and give a report of his investigation to President M. M. Wall of the New York State Motor Federation. Gasoline has gone from 12c to 25c during the past six months, and with the large increase in the use of automobiles it is imperative that something be done to compel the oil monopolies to quote a more reasonable price for this national fuel.

Commissioner Lane has been in correspondence with Counsel John J. McInerney of the Federation, and both the Department of Agriculture and the Motor Federation are cooperating with a view of securing a reasonable and uniform price on gasoline. The price of automobiles is going down, while the gasoline tax placed by the oil companies is increasing every week.

Another important subject the Motor Federation is working upon at the present time is that of investigating the operations of the International Auomobile League of Buffalo. Motorists who have had any dealings with this concern would do well to report the matter to the Federation for future action.

NORMAL WINS LISTLESS GAME

High Late in Reaching Scoring Point, But Oswego Boys Had Landers to Fal Back Upon.

For the second time this season the High school basketball team was defeated at the City Hall court by the Normal team from Oswego—principally through the superior playing of Landers, the star center of the Oswego team who was responsible for the Normal's former victory. The final score of the game was 40-21.

The game was witnessed by one of the largest crowds of the season. A large Oswego delegation accompanied the team to this city and afterwards danced at the Library.

The game was interesting at times, but in the latter half owing to the roughness displayed, grew listless and the dullness wasb roken only by an occasional shot from a scrambling group on the floor.

For five minutes after the first whistle the ball was passed around without either team being able to net a basket, when Fulton High broke into the scoring column with a goal from the foul line. Frawley made the point. The foul was called on Carroll, who was later put out of the game by Referee Morin following a repetition of personal fouls. Reynolds immediately after Frawley's shot scored a basket from the field, making the local team's total three. Landers, however, brought his team up an a par with thel ocal outfit when he shot three fouls in succession. Carroll followed with a basket which was of a sensational order. Martin evened up the score with a basket, making the totals 5 in all. Carroll with another sensational shot put his team in the lead and following several fouls called on Carroll, which resulted in his disqualification from theg ame, Frawley was able to put Fulton High in the lead, but this was short-lived when Landers again netted a basket from the foul line. From this time on, the Fulton tea never had a lookin, the Oswego boys scoring basket after basket, and the half closed with the score 20-8 in favor of the visitors.

The second half opened with neither team able to score for several minutes until Landers made his way through the field on a dribble and netted the first basket. He repeated with a foul and basket from the field. The Oswego team had no difficulty in increasing their lead throughout the remaining portion of the game and towards the finish, Landers put three through the net as a general reminder, that he was still in the game.

Scoring 7 field baskets and 10 from the foul line, Landers made 24 of the 40 points credited to the Normals.

Thel ineup of the teams was as follows:

| Oswego | | Fulton |
|---|---|---|
| Tompkins | Left Forward | Reynolds |
| Frawley | Right Forward | Martin |
| Landers | Center | Wallace |
| Myers | Right Guard | E. Frawley |

Baskets from the field—Tompkins, Frawley, M. (4); Landers, (7); Myers, Carroll, (2); Park, Reynolds, (3); Martin, (4); Wallace, E. Frawley, (4).

Referee—Morin. Time of halves—20 minutes.

try on the question of compulsion, and also that it was a grevious thing that thel abor conference should have so entirely ignored the country's military experts. In his opinion Mr. James Ramsay MacDonald, chairman of thel abor party, was presumptuous in setting up his opinion in defiance of the experts.

Mr. Roberts was unable to say what would happen. He declared that he and his colleagues, Arthur Henderson and William Brace, intended to continue voting for the compulsion bill, and he supposed it would be open to the labor party to expel them.

To the American reader one of the most interesting suggestions heard in London was thep roposal to introduce the referendum as the alternative for a general election if dangerous hostility appears to be developing in thec ountry at large during the later stages of the conscription bill before Parliament. The referendum frequently has been suggested in England in the last few years as a desirable addition to thel egislative machinery of the kingdom. It was adopted as a part of the unionist programme of constitutional reform five or six years ago.

A BIT OF THE GOSPEL OF GOOD TIMES FOR FULTON

CO-ED'S HUBBY WAS "MADE TO ORDER"

He Followed Every Rule Laid Down by Her.

Evanston, Ill.—Mrs. Howard Osborn, college bride of Northwestern university, always said if she married at all she'd marry a model man. Having no respect for what modern civilization is producing in the way of manly perfection, she proceeded to model a man after her own liking.

Result: She's now the bride of a handsome young collegian, first in athletics, first in scholarship, first in the hearts of his fellow students at Northwestern.

The college bride's plan has Mrs. E. H. Harriman's million dollar scheme for perfecting the human race beaten by a whole generation. Mrs. Harriman's perfect man will not arrive until 1980; Mrs. Osborn's is a 1915 model. And he owes his model character not to science, but to romance.

When Osborn came from Coldwater, Mich., to Northwestern university to "work his way through college" the first co-ed he became interested in was Mildred Lamke. Mildred didn't knit him a rose colored tie, nor did she embroider college pennants for him, but she did take a great interest in his diet, in his manner of living and his plan of study.

The very first present she gave him—three days after their first meeting—was this set of rules:

Rise at 6 in the morning.

Cold shower bath and exercise every morning.

Breakfast on dry toast and coffee.

Pay close attention to co-eds.

No smoking, no drinking, no loafing, no overeating.

Sleep eight hours out of twenty-four.

Practice daily in athletic field.

Howard followed every rule faithfully for four years. When he was graduated last June he had a gold medal for athletics, a gold medal for scholarship, several medals for minor achievements—and the most popular girl in college for his promised bride.

BLASIAR IS YOUNGEST AVIATOR IN AMERICA

Norwich (Conn.) Youth Expects to Be of Service to U. S.

Norwich, Conn.—Since the death of Cecil Peoli at Washington last spring Arthur F. Blasiar, twenty-two, a resident of Guilford, nearby, is the youngest aviator in America holding a license under the International Federation of Aeronautics.

Mr. Blasiar left recently for Canada and contemplates going to Russia, where he will demonstrate and instruct Russian army officers in the operation of the Sperry gyroscope aeroplane stabilizer and target sighter.

When interviewed by a newspaper reporter Mr. Blasiar said: "The Sperry stabilizer enables the pilot to fly without giving attention to lateral or longitudinal control. This relieves him from much stress and make it possible for him to give his attention to dropping bombs with the target sighter.

"He can drop each bomb with accuracy and effect. These are the only instruments of their kind and are American inventions. The machines on which they have been installed are the largest and most powerful made. They are propelled by two tractor screws turning in opposite directions and developing over 300 horsepower. They drive the machine at a minimum speed of forty-five miles per hour and a maximum of 105 miles. This makes it possible for them to go faster than the speedy scouting aeroplanes.

"The total load is 7,800 pounds, of which 2,600 pounds are bombs or explosives. There are two operators. The delicate parts are protected with armor, making it almost impossible to be shot down. It is possible for an enemy to launch one of these machines 400 miles at sea and fly over New York city, drop a ton of high explosives and return to its base of supply, causing great loss of life and property.

"The appearance of this great air destroyer is that of a huge beetle, as its two wings spread nearly 100 feet. The nacelle, or body, in which are the motors, fuel, munitions and operators, during flights takes on a hideous appearance in the air.

"My sole aim is that I may obtain actual experience in the art of modern aerial warfare. As a true American I feel it my duty that I may be of greater service to my country in a possible future war. The aeroplane is the eye of the nation."

TURNED THE LAUGH.

Tom Marshall's Ready Wit Saved Him When He Was Cornered.

Tom Marshall of Kentucky, who flourished as an orator and wit in the last century, was a gallant gentleman who, opportunity offering, distributed his osculatory activities without regard to age, race or previous condition of servitude.

One Christmas eve the gallant Tom met in the hall the pretty octoroon slave maid of Miss Breckinridge, a society leader and belle. Tom promptly kissed the maid and then expressed his appreciation by giving her for a Christmas present what he supposed was a twenty dollar gold piece. In fact, it was a gold medal that had been presented to him by the citizens of Frankfort, Ky., for some services rendered to that burg.

The girl tried to change the gold piece, when the storekeeper, supposing it to be stolen, impounded it and gave it to her mistress. The girl, being called to account, admitted that it was a Christmas gift from Mr. Marshall and confessed that the hall was dark and that Tom kissed her before she could help it.

Miss Breckinridge determined to give Mr. Marshall a lesson in good manners, so that evening at a brilliant social function she assembled half a dozen Louisiana belles about her and, calling Tom to the group, handed him the medal and said: "Mr. Marshall, here is something you parted with in the dark. It is restored to you in the light." Tom replied promptly. "It was dark sure enough; but, believe me, Miss Breckinridge, if I had known it was you I wouldn't have given you a cent."—Los Angeles Times.

Conscience.

In the commission of evil another is but one witness against thee; thou art a thousand against thyself. Another thou mayest avoid—thyself thou canst not.—Quarles.

Cheering Him Up.

Two men, one very tall and stout, the other short and slim, are inseparable, and friends say that they take advantage of their close companionship to make one another the butts of various jokes.

"I'M ABOUT HALF SICK."

Sometimes it is the little fellow that suffers, but oftener the laugh is at the expense of the giant.

The big man is not always as healthy as his size might indicate. In fact he often complains of the way he is feeling, and his small companion takes him to task for doing so. This occurred the other day within hearing of a crowd on a street corner.

They met there, and the little fellow asked:

"Well, how are you feeling today?"

"I'm about half sick," was the reply.

"Go on, man," cried the little fellow, who could see nothing wrong with his friend. "Even if you're half sick there's more of you well right now than there is of me."—Exchange.

The Law of the Sea.

There was a very bad first night in a New York theater—that is to say, the night was a good night as nights go in New York during the theatrical season, but the play that had been offered was bad.

At the end of the second act the long suffering audience was about ready to quit. A few got up to go, and others followed until the aisles became congested.

Charles Hanson Towne arose in his place well down in front.

"Wait!" he called out in a clear, loud tone. "Women and children first!"—Saturday Evening Post.

A Lincoln Comment.

In "The Life and Letters of John Hay" is this diary entry which gives a typical glimpse of Lincoln:

"I said to the president today that I thought Butler was the only man in the army in whom power would be dangerous. McClellan was too timid and vacillating to usurp; Grant was too sound and cool headed and unselfish; Banks also; Fremont would be dangerous if he had more ability and energy.

" 'Yes,' says the president, 'he is like Jim Jett's brother. Jim used to say that his brother was the darnedest scoundrel that ever lived, but in the infinite mercy of Providence he was also the darnedest fool.' "

A Double Secret

By EUNICE BLAKE

Mr. George Smith at fifty looked forward to a lonely old age. He wished to marry, but there was an impediment in the way of his marrying. At thirty he had married a girl of seventeen against her parents' wishes. Seventeen is a tender age for a woman to be placed in antagonism with her mother, and a husband who under such circumstances attempts to contend with a mother-in-law is quite likely to get the worst of it. One day, but a month after his wedding—at the end of the honeymoon—Mr. Smith went home from business to find the newly built nest deserted. His wife's mother had swooped down on her and carried off her chick.

It was six months before the bereaved husband could discover where his wife had been taken. Then he also learned that she was dead. At any rate, his mother-in-law wrote him to that effect. But whether the lady did so that she might cause him to cease to pursue her daughter or whether she wrote the truth he was not quite certain.

But now, twenty years from the date of his marriage, he met a maiden lady verging on to forty with whom he was very companionable. He never told her about his marriage, for he made up his mind to win her if possible and feared that if he admitted any doubt as to his being free to marry she would not take the risk. When he proposed to her she surprised him with a confession. She informed him that the name she bore was not hers legally. There was a long story to tell in connection with the matter of her passing under an assumed name that she would tell him if he cared to hear it, after which he might judge for himself if he wished to marry her.

Smith after a few moments of thought replied that there was a matrimonial hitch in his own case. If he told her what it was it would always worry her; if he knew what hers was it would worry him. Would it not be well for him to keep his secret and vice versa? In his own case there was not one chance in a thousand of there being any trouble. She said that the same was true in her own case. She would take the risk if he would. After awhile they concluded that what had been proposed was the sensible thing to do, and they were married.

Things don't always turn out as expected. Instead of there now being two causes for worry there were four. Mr. Smith in addition to having his own affair to trouble him had that of his wife. Mrs. Smith also had two cares of worry where she had had one. Then, too, curiosity came in to make matters worse.

The prime difficulty in their new unburdening themselves to each other was that fearing they would not adhere to their resolution of keeping their secret they had each registered a vow to maintain it inviolate. Mr. Smith, who was engrossed in business, did not find it difficult to keep his vow, but Mrs. Smith, who had little to occupy her mind, dwelt upon her husband's secret continually. One day she said to him:

"Dear, I have concluded that I must know your secret. True, you have made a vow not to reveal it, but that vow was made to me, and I release you."

"Why cannot you dismiss this matter from your mind?" he asked. "If I tell you my secret I am entitled to know yours. I don't wish to know it. Possibly if I did I might feel something, do something, say something to spoil our happiness. As it is, we are passing on without anything to mar it. Why not let the matter rest as it is? Remember Pandora and the box of troubles she opened."

This was all very well, but the curious bee had been buzzing in Mrs. Smith's bonnet so long that she could endure it no longer. However, something occurred to bring about a revelation of both mysteries. One morning the postman delivered the mail while the Smiths were at breakfast. Mrs. Smith opened a letter addressed to her and turned pale. Seeing that she was about to faint, her husband ran to her and caught her in his arms. She came to herself in a few moments.

"What is it, darling?" cried her husband.

"Read it."

Taking up the letter, he read:

When your mother died she left it discretionary with me to make a confession for her. I have not long to live and have concluded to make it before I die. Your mother spoke falsely when she told you your husband was dead. She also wrote him that you were dead.

Something glimmered upon George Smith. An idea was trying to permeate his brain.

"What was your maiden name?" he gasped.

"Stacey—Arietta Stacey."

Throwing his arms about her, he squeezed her till she cried out.

"Thank heaven!" he cried.

"What for?"

"I am your first as well as your second husband. You are my first and second wife."

"How do you know?"

"I married Arietta Stacey when she was seventeen years old. Why did you change your name?"

"Mother forced me to do so to keep you from finding me."

"But you have known my name since our marriage."

"Yes, but Smith is not an uncommon name."

For the Children

Little Miss Robbins Coasting In New York.

Snow in Central park, New York city, is a great source of pleasure to the little people who live in the vicinity of the city's greatest playground. The young miss in the picture, who is so gayly taking advantage of the fun provided by a fall of snow, is Miss Frances Robbins, daughter of Mr. Henry Pelham Robbins. She is making the most of the snow. Lying flat on her speedy sled, she is dashing down the hill, shouting to those in her path to clear the way. Such scenes are very common in New York city this winter, as old King Boreas has been kind enough to send his snow sprites to distribute his favers in the big town. Grown people don't care so very much for snow in the city, but the little people think it's splendid fun.

"The Trades of the Dumb."

Any number of children can play this game, and it is amusing and interesting. Let one player repair to the hall or to another room and decide what trade he will represent. When ready he knocks on the door and enters. Without a word or a smile he begins by motions to show what his chosen trade is. Perhaps he is a carpenter. Then he pretends to hammer nails, to saw or plane a board. Perhaps he is a coachman. In that case he makes believe to drive a horse, to turn a carriage or make the steed go. A tailor sews and cuts imaginary cloth and tries on garments. A painter goes through the motions of painting, dipping an unseen brush into a pretended pail and spreading the paint on wall or floor. There are other trades. One may be a musician, a policeman, sweeper, dressmaker, milliner, farmer, butcher, baker, grocer or sailor.

If the player laughs or answers or speaks he must pay a forfeit when the game is over. The other players try their best by making funny remarks to cause him to laugh and lose his dumbness, and he has to be very alert not to get caught answering some question or suggestion.

"Parcel Post."

Players sit in a circle. Each person is supposed to be a package and is given a number. One person blindfolded is in the center. If there are more than fifteen players there may be two or more players blindfolded. When the players in the center call two or more numbers the players answering to those numbers shall exchange places and are liable to be caught by the center players during the exchange. When the center players become tired trying to catch any one they may call, "General delivery!" At once every one jumps up and runs for a new seat. When a player is caught he becomes the blindfolded one. Each one keeps the same number throughout the game.

Potato Peeling Race.

A potato peeling race is good fun if the party is informal and the guests not too daintily clad. The hostess provides a clean potato for each guest, and at a signal all start peeling at once. The one who gets through first and produces an unbroken peel gets the prize. This is more fun than an apple peeling contest because of the little knots and eyes in the potatoes.

The Cooky Cat.

Grandmamma made a cooky cat,
Brown and spicy and round and fat.
She set it up on the pantry shelf,
Safe and sound, and said to herself,
"Tomorrow morning when Bobby comes I'll give him that cat and some sugar plums."
And grandmamma smiled and felt very glad,
For Bobby was such a dear little lad.

But, alas, when the house was dark and still
The cooky cat felt a sudden thrill,
For she heard the patter of tiny mice.
Nearer and nearer they slyly came
The cooky cat trembled through all her frame.
They climbed to the shelf on which she sat.
Alas, alas, for the cooky cat!
She pleaded for mercy. The mice said: "Nay,
For 'turn about' is, you see, fair play.
A cat will always eat mice, and that Makes it fair for the mice to eat the cat!"
—St. Nicholas.

A Meeting

By SARAH BAXTER

One evening at a social gathering in New York city a girl sat alone, and those who passed her would have wondered how one so attractive looking could be a wallflower were they not cognizant of the fact that the higher the social status the greater the selfishness. To speak more plainly, the young lady, a Miss Starkweather, was a western girl visiting an aunt, and her way into society had not been paved for her by certain requisites without which an unknown girl could not hope for any attention.

The hostess observed Miss Starkweather sitting by herself and thought of a plan. She had no especial sympathy with the girl, but a lady to whom she was under obligations socially had asked for an invitation for a man with whom her husband had had dealings in Colorado, who had come to New York and said her husband considered it to his interest to treat him with especial attention. The hostess found the above named guest, Peter Gallagher, holding his hands with a bored look on his face and took him to Miss Starkweather and introduced him.

When the young lady heard the name and looked up into the man's eyes it was evident that there was a commotion in her bosom.

"Gallagher, did you say?" she asked.

"Yes'm; I'm Peter Gallagher of Colorado."

"Did you ever live in Arizona?"

"I certainly did."

The man seated himself beside the girl, who was a dozen years his junior, and the two fell into an animated conversation. Mr. Gallagher was desirous of learning what the young lady knew about him, and by way of repay she told him a story.

"Once upon a time," she said, "a man, his wife and several children, the oldest of whom was a girl of twelve, lived in a cabin on a prairie. There were no forests to obstruct the view and few houses. One morning the oldest girl, Alice, went out of the cabin for water with which to make coffee for breakfast and against the rising sun saw a horseman coming at a gallop. She watched him till he came near, then went into the cabin and told her father.

"The settler met the horseman at the door, and the latter said:

"'There's been a murder over at Hilson, and your revolver with your initials carved on the handle has been found near by. I don't believe it's yours, is it?'

"'No.'

"'Some one used it to put the job on to you. The committee found it and are coming for you. Get on your horse—quick!'

"The settler got out his fastest horse, and the two galloped away. They had scarcely gone when Alice saw coming, not a man, but a dozen. As soon as they reached her father's cabin they scattered themselves around it, and one of them, the sheriff, called on the settler to come out and surrender himself. The wife and mother went to the door and in a trembling voice assured him that her husband was not there. Throwing himself off his horse, the sheriff went into the house and searched every nook and corner. Not finding whom he wanted, he rode away with his men, who meanwhile had noticed fresh tracks of horses' hoofs in the same direction as the settler and the man who had warned him, leaving the woman and her children in an agony of fear, for there had been many brutal murders in that region, and the vigilance committee were endeavoring to stamp them out without wasting time in trying those accused.

"The committee overtook the settler and the man who had warned him, and the latter stopped and faced them. He told them he was convinced that the man they were after was innocent of crime. The sheriff said he was convinced to the contrary. Then the other said he would not see an innocent man strung up without an effort to save him and they would have to fight the two together.

"This turned the scale, and the settler surrendered on condition that he be fairly tried. He was acquitted and returned to his family. He told his wife and children how he had been saved from being hanged and charged them all to reverence forever the man who had so nobly stood by him."

The girl paused, her last words being spoken in a tremulous voice.

"I think I remember somepin like that," said Mr. Gallagher. "You refer to John Starkweather. He'd done me a favor once, and, seeing that he was shore to be strung up for somepin he hadn't done I lit out to warn him. Was you one of the children who was in the cabin that mornin'?"

"I was the oldest girl, Alice."

"Well, now, it's queer, isn't it, that I should meet you among these God forsaken people? Don't you want to go back to a respectable community?"

"I think I do."

"Who is that man?" asked a guest, referring to Mr. Gallagher. "He doesn't look as if he belonged here."

"He doesn't," was the reply. "He's one of the biggest gold mine owners in Colorado."

Persons overhearing this sought an introduction to the stranger, but he was on the point of leaving.

Not long after this Gallagher returned to what he called a respectable community, and Alice Starkweather went with him as his wife.

Frock of Self Striped Voile.

A pleasing little one-piece frock of self-striped voile trimmed with large pockets and belt and collar of contrasting material.

There is nothing prettier among the inexpensive materials for developing this frock than tapestry blue self-striped voile. It is smart when made upon even the simplest lines and combines well with trimmings of the same or contrasting material. This model is made without a lining, and the back of the waist extends over the front to give a yoke effect with pointed tabs. The attached skirt is a four-piece design finished with a deep hem at the lower edge and trimmed on either side of the front with large pockets. In medium size the dress requires 3⅝ yards 54-inch material, with ⅝ yard contrasting material for collar and belt.

There can be no mistake in cutting the dress if the guide is carefully studied, for each section of the pattern is placed to secure smart lines and avoid waste of material. The collar sections and back of the waist are laid on the lengthwise fold of goods as illustrated, and the belt is placed in the same way, but can be laid crosswise also if desired.

The front gore of the skirt runs parallel with the selvage of the voile, resting on a lengthwise thread. The sleeve and pocket come next, and to the right of these is the front and cuff. After these sections are placed there still remains considerable space on which to place the back gore of the skirt.

If the tabular effect is not fancied for the yoke, then cut off the pointed shoulder edge of back ⅝ inch forward on line of small "o" perforations. To shorten the skirt the hem may be made deeper or the lower edges of the gores cut off the desired amount.

While the use of contrasting material for the belt and collar are exceedingly smart, the dress will be in equally good taste if made entirely of the voile.

That Week End Trip

Really it is a troublesome thing to pack up one's clothes for a short visit, perhaps more troublesome than to pack them for a long trip. A year or two ago, when skirts were scant and bodices flimy, one could get a week end wardrobe into a suit case without trouble. But now, when skirts are full and collars are high, sleeves are long and the fashionable fabrics are rather clumsy, the getting of enough clothes into the kind of luggage one is supposed to carry on a week end visit is something of a problem.

Week end trunks, which are large enough to hold a good many clothes and yet small enough for a porter to carry, small enough, too, to be stowed in an automobile, are useful for the short visit. But, lacking one of these, a big suit case and a small leather bag will do.

The woman who travels with little luggage must beware too many convenient cases. Attractive they may be, but they take up room that is often needed for clothes. Tissue paper answers the purpose of protecting one's frocks and takes less room than many of the rather cumbersome cases.

Take a thin negligee, a pair of the lightest sort of bedroom slippers—heelless cretonne or silk mules are a good choice—and lingerie that takes up little room. Really in this way a good deal of space may be saved. It is too bad, so far as the week end visitor is concerned, that petticoats have returned to style, for space must be left for a petticoat to wear with one's evening frock. However, this need not be bulky. The taffeta petticoat may be worn under the street frock or suit.

Lingerie, stockings, necessary toilet articles and nightwear need not take up much room. The only shoes needed are a pair of evening slippers in addition to the street boots worn, unless sport shoes of some sort are needed.

It is quite possible to wear a serge frock under a big coat—a serge frock that will serve for morning and luncheon, for walking and motoring. Or a three piece suit may take the place of the frock and coat. One's hostess can always provide an extra coat for motoring, if necessary.

If carefully packed, lingerie, night things and toilet articles can all be stowed in the small bag. This leaves the suit case for shoes and frocks.

Use plenty of tissue paper in packing the evening frock. Stuff out the sleeves and bodice with it and place a roll of paper under the folds necessary to get the garment into the suit case. And don't pack the frock down with many things on top of it, especially if it is taffeta. A satin evening frock is a far wiser choice for the week end traveler.

A sweater, blouse and sport skirt can be placed first in the suit case, with the evening frock on top. Even in these days of full skirts a frock of satin and georgette crepe can be packed in small compass. And neither the crepe nor the satin wrinkles readily.

Most week end visits are made at short distances, and if one's bags are packed at the last moment before starting forth and unpacked at the first moment after arriving at one's destination the clothes need not be long confined. They should be immediately shaken out and placed on hangers.

A COAT FOR JANUARY.

Built on Good Lines and Slightly Dressier Than a Topcoat.

AGAIN NAVY BLUE.

Fashioned of navy broadcloth, fastened with novelty buttons, banded, cuffed and collared with Hudson seal and belted in a tier, this coat, so warmly lined with heavy taffeta, makes a serviceable winter garment for walking. The jaunty turban, so suitable for this kind of coat, has a background of osprey feathers.

FIRST AID ESSENTIALS.

What Mothers Should Keep In the Bathroom Medicine Closet.

Accidents will happen as long as we are human, and particularly so while we are children. But the irritating part about accidents is that we do not expect them and that they all have one thing in common—they happen at the wrong time. When you have no peroxide you cut your finger. When Charlie burned his hand at the bonfire you were without olive oil or ointment to soothe the pain. So, the wisest thing to do is to be prepared for war in time of peace, to talk in the language of the day. A good many serious results have been avoided by having a wound dressed properly in the nick of time. Every household, and that means every mother, ought to have a little box, cabinet or other safe place always filled with a few essentials which will prevent unfortunate consequences.

Antiseptics for small wounds should be the first essential.

A small bottle of linseed oil and lime water oil comes next. And you know that it is the open blister which sometimes causes tetanus.

Boracic acid to wash out sores before putting the dressing on is not to be dispensed with. Turpentine is also a splendid thing against infection of sores from rusty nails.

Do not let us forget the almost inevitable bottle of castor oil or milk of magnesia in case of fever and indigestion. A small quantity of essence of peppermint and spirits of ammonia should also be added, because sick stomach is a frequent occurrence with the little ones. A box of bicarbonate of soda and one filled with epsom salts are indispensable.

French Coffee.

One quart of water to one cupful of very finely ground coffee. Put coffee grounds in bowl, pour over about half a pint of cold water and let stand for fifteen minutes. Bring remaining water to a boil, take coffee in bowl and strain through a fine sieve; then take French coffee pot, put coffee grounds in strainer at top of French pot, leaving water in bowl; then take boiling water and pour over coffee very slowly; then set coffeepot on stove for five minutes; must not boil; take off and pour in cold water from bowl that coffee was first cooled in to settle. Serve in another pot. The French, who have the reputation of making the best coffee, use three parts Java to one part Mocha.

Skating Corset.

The skating vogue has been responsible for all manner of dress accessories from shoes to caps, with the inclusion of jackets and suits between. And now comes the skating corset, designed especially for the devotees of that exhilarating sport. This particular type of corset has silk webbing over the hips, and the fact that there is no steel down the front makes every movement exceedingly easy and graceful. The corset comes in pink, delicately trimmed. Its price is a little over $1.

MRS. ASQUITH AND LADY HAIG ACTIVE

Husbands' Elevation to High Positions Accredited to Them.

HAVE GREAT INFLUENCE.

Great Britain Prime Minister's Wife of Material Assistance to Him, and She Is Probably Most Influential Woman in English Politics—Lady Haig Also Powerful.

London.—Two women, Mrs. Asquith and Lady Haig, are playing an active part in Great Britain's politics. To their work is accredited the elevation of their husbands to high positions.

The action brought by Mrs. Asquith, the wife of the prime minister, against the London Globe to restrain its editor from publishing any more letters from its readers indirectly referring to her as a friend of German prisoners of war interned in Donnington Hall had much more behind it than the extremely courageous action of an independent and fearless woman.

The prime minister's wife is probably the most influential woman in English politics in modern days. The late Duchess of Devonshire, the "Double Duchess," as she was called because she captured two ducal titles in succession, that of the seventh holder of the Manchester title and the eighth of Devonshire, could perhaps have had greater political power if she could have persuaded the indolent Duke of Devonshire to accept the office of prime minister. Mrs. Asquith, on the other hand, is commonly believed to have materially assisted her husband to this high office. His enemies have always been legion and his friends not numerous, his character being that of the serious Scotsman who forms emotional ties with difficulty.

Mrs. Asquith, brilliant, witty, temperamental and intellectual and invariably entertaining, has supplied this deficiency and by her tact and charm she has kept unimpaired many political friendships useful to her husband.

The withdrawal of the British forces from the Gallipoli peninsula is credited to Mrs. Asquith's advice, coupled with the recommendation of Major General C. C. Monro, who succeeded General Sir Ian Hamilton as commander at the Dardanelles, which was made public in the house of lords by Lord Ribblesdale, Mrs. Asquith's brother-in-law.

Lady Haig, the wife of General Sir Douglas Haig, who has taken over the command of the British troops in France as the successor of Field Marshal Viscount French, is credited with having exerted great influence toward her husband's advancement in the army. She was the Hon. Maud Vivian, one of the "Vivian twins," who were famous as maids of honor to Queen Victoria and Queen Alexandra. Before his marriage to Miss Vivian ten years ago Haig was a favorite with General French, having served under French at Aldershot and then accompanying him to South Africa during the Boer war. Whatever French has been able to do for Haig has been done, but his present high command is the result more of the influence at court of Lady Haig, and Lord Kitchener has been persuaded by royalty's desires to advance the man most favored by his old enemy, General French. Sir Douglas Haig was promoted to be a full general only a year ago, although he had held the post as chief of staff in India for some years, having won it through the influence of King Edward and Queen Alexandra.

Sir Douglas and Lady Haig have not taken any particular pains to assume any leadership in London society since their marriage and have not kept up a London residence during visits home from India, spending their time at Aldershot, where Haig earned the nickname of "Von Haig" on account of his Prussian thoroughness in military matters and his stern way of handling subordinates. He and Lady Haig have two children, daughters, named after the two queens whom Lady Haig served—Alexandra Henrietta Louise, born in 1907, and Victoria Doris Rachel, born in 1908.

BOTTLE FLOATED 16 YEARS.

It Was Thrown, With a Note, Into the Pacific Ocean In 1899.

Hoquiam, Wash.—After floating about in the Pacific ocean for years a bottle containing a note, probably written and thrown overboard by one of the officers of the schooner Transit, has been found on the beach by an Indian, Bob Wayne, near Moclips.

The note was dated Aug. 10, 1899, and was perfectly legible, though the writing and the paper were considerably faded. The message with the note reads as follows:

Schooner Transit, Aug. 10, 1899.—Ten days out from Honolulu, H. I., bound to San Francisco. Weather calm and baffling wind. All is well. Latitude 29 degrees 44 minutes north, longitude 156 degrees 7 minutes west. J. PETERSON.

Wayne found the bottle on the beach after the record high tide of the winter, which followed several days of a heavy offshore blow, which brought in a heavy surf.

LEG BONE PATCHES SPINE.

Altoona Boy Is Now Jubilant After Unusual Operation.

Altoona, Pa.—Kenneth Geist, aged four, is perhaps the happiest child in the United States, for recently he received his discharge from the hospital here.

He was admitted to the hospital on Christmas, 1913, suffering from tuberculosis of the spine. He could neither talk nor walk, and the case was thought hopeless.

The surgeons took a piece of bone from his right leg and inserted it in the place where they removed the diseased vertebra. The operation was successful, and Kenneth can run, talk and play like other boys.

LEPROSY CHECKED BY OLD INDIAN REMEDY

Doctor Insists Victim Is No Longer Menace to Workmen.

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Ignorant that he was suffering from leprosy in an advanced stage—the physician who had sent him had not diagnosed the disease—a man came to Dr. Udo Wile of the medical faculty of the University of Michigan last July. He was a pitiable object. His body was covered with leprous lesions.

Dr. Wile took the sufferer into the university general hospital and has treated him with chaul-moogra oil, a remedy for leprosy that has been used for generations in India, unsuccessfully in the great majority of cases.

Now his disease, which oftenest condemns a man to life confinement in a colony of his fellow sufferers, is arrested. The patient is making a splendid recovery, Dr. Wile says. He is strong and walks two miles each day. No more men shame him by calling him "unclean."

He is no more dangerous to any community now than a tuberculosis patient, Dr. Wile insists. The doctor adds:

"Work is given to a tuberculosis patient who is able to work. No one questions his duty and right to support himself and his family. Work should be given to this man, once the most despised and feared of humans—a leper."

The man's name is withheld that, unknown, he may begin life anew and earn bread for his wife and their baby. His entry into the hospital was affecting, dramatic.

It so happened that a medical convention was being held here, and the different clinics were open to the visiting physicians. Dr. Wile had not seen the patient until he was wheeled into the clinic. The doctor's face went white. Visitors leaned forward and peered upon the man's nude body. Their faces were tense, for they knew—they thought him doomed.

The examination soon over, the patient was wheeled out, and Dr. Wile said, with emotion:

"That man has a well advanced case of leprosy. I must tell him, and it will seem to him like reading his death warrant. When his disease becomes known it is doubtful if we can keep him here. Even if the leprosy cannot be arrested the man has ten years yet before him in which he might earn a living were it not that he will be hounded from place to place; every man's hand will be against him."

"Is he cured—will he ever be absolutely cured?" Dr. Wile was asked.

"A cure is always relative," answered the doctor. "At present all the symptoms that characterize leprosy have disappeared in this case. He is strong, confident, hopeful. If you ask me whether the leprous symptoms will reappear I can no more tell you than I can assure a man healthy today that he will be in health as good ten or fifteen years hence."

BOY A FINANCIER.

Lad Fourteen Years Old Makes Money Out of Sheep.

Ipswich, S. D.—Gerald Pershin, fourteen years of age, gives promise of being one of the financiers of the country.

On Sept. 5, 1914, the boy went to M. A. Slocum, a friend, and told him that he had a chance to buy twenty-five old ewes from Robert Jones at a bargain. Mr. Slocum went with the boy to the bank and signed a note with him, thereby enabling the boy to get the funds.

The other day the boy entered the bank, paid over $83.00, his note with interest, and remarked that he had cleaned up $110.80 clean profit on his sheep during the year. He had sold $28 worth of wool and had sold his original purchase and their increase, less five sheep the coyotes had killed, for $166.40.

PUFFED UP LIKE A BALLOON.

Rock Island (Ill.) Doctors Puncture Boy's Skin and Save His Life.

Rock Island, Ill.—The body of Fred Lawson, eleven years old, swelled to twice its normal size as the result of an accident, and for a time his life was endangered.

While coasting the boy was struck in the neck by a piece of wagon wheel rim protruding from the ground. The bronchial tube was punctured, and in exhaling his breath much of the air passed through this puncture and under the skin, causing the body to inflate.

Young Lawson was at the point of suffocation when physicians arrived. Their first act was to puncture the skin of the neck and allow the air to escape. They say the boy will live.

SAND SPRINGS, OKLA., MADE FOR WIDOWS

Oil Producer Using Wealth on Women and Children.

Sand Springs, Okla.—This town was built for widows. They compose more than a fourth of the 5,000 population. The town was founded by Charles Page, multimillionaire oil producer of Tulsa.

His earliest recollections were of his mother's efforts to raise her large family unaided, and he resolved that when he grew up he would take care of all the widows.

When he made his fortune Page founded Sand Springs. He built dozens of comfortable cottages in which gas, fuel and rent were free. Factories he bought so the widows might have employment.

He built a car line to Tulsa upon which widows ride free. There are a day nursery, free medical attendance and a vocational school. If a widow wants to get married Page helps her do that. He likes grandmothers too. There are a score of them here, with nothing to do but knit and read and reminisce.

Page probably has more "children" than any other man in the world. An orphans' home in a nearby town recently went bankrupt. To provide better for the little inmates Page legally adopted the whole institution and moved it to Sand Springs.

WOMAN KILLS EAGLE.

Pulaski County Resident Wins Record by Not Using Gun.

Rolla, Mo.—Mrs. J. H. Arthur, who lives near Laquey, Pulaski county, probably enjoys the distinction of being the only woman in Missouri to kill an eagle without the aid of a gun.

Recently she heard a noise in the chicken yard and saw a large eagle swoop down on the flock. A watchdog rushed upon the eagle and knocked it to the ground. Mrs. Arthur grabbed a long piece of wagon tire and struck it with all her might, breaking its neck and right wing. The eagle measured six feet four inches from tip to tip.

TWO DRINKS, TWO YEARS.

Local Option Law Violator of Fort Worth, Tex., Gets Limit.

Fort Worth, Tex.—Charles Pettigrew was defendant in the first case tried in Tarrant county under the law making it a felony to sell liquor in local option territory. He was convicted and sentenced to two years. He sold two drinks to the same man.

Pettigrew was indicted in January, and his first trial was on an indictment that carried only a misdemeanor penalty. He escaped on a technicality. The next indictment under the felony law also was held defective, but the third one was sustained.

GEARY'S POPULAR SCHOOL.

It Boasts Seven Pairs of Twins. Claims Record For Oklahoma.

Geary, Okla.—The Geary school lays claim to the unique distinction of having more pairs of twins attending the school than any other school of its size in the state.

At the present time there are seven pairs of twins enrolled and another girl attending who has a twin brother, who will probably start after the new year. This will bring the total number of twin pairs enrolled up to eight. These twins are scattered all the way through the school from the primary to the senior class.

OUTDOOR CHILDREN NEEDED, SHE SAYS

Make Better Men and Women, Mrs. E. T. Seton Asserts.

MUST LEARN NATURAL LAWS.

"If You Catch Humanity Young Enough Chance of Letting In the Light Is Greater," Declares Wife of Nature Writer—Lauds New Movement.

New York.—"One reason why I am so much interested in the outdoor movement that is sweeping over the country," said Mrs. Grace Gallatin Seton recently, "is because I believe that a nation can rise no higher than the level of its women and that it is best to begin early to make our women all that they should be to become the fitting wives and mothers of the race."

Mrs. Seton, wife of Ernest Thompson Seton and a member of the Council of the Woodcraft League, went on:

"It is also important to begin teaching the men while they are in the receptive period of boyhood the proper attitude toward women. If boys and girls are brought up side by side with certain fundamental ideas of equality there will be no time when the man, having attained his majority, will have to reconstruct his ideas concerning the equal partnership of men and women in the various relationships of life, social, marital and civic.

"Nowadays a boy in many instances is permitted to feel when he comes into young manhood that his mother's opinions no longer have the same value they did when he was a growing boy. He thinks she doesn't understand the important things of life. Later, when his reason begins to operate, he has to fight the inheritance of a secret sense of man's superiority or remain hopelessly fixed in his view of humanity as a whole.

"One of the important things in the education of a boy is first of all to let him know the physical aspect of the country he lives in, the out of doors world about him and the natural laws that govern everything in it.

"And how important it is that the girls know outdoor life too! Therefore, that the training shall be fundamentally alike up to the point where it naturally separates, it is important that girls as well as boys shall have much of outdoor life in their younger years.

"A great deal of the value of outdoor life and work comes from the recovery of past knowledge of how to do things. It is a working out of the problem of development—a getting back to the source of creation in acquiring knowledge and efficiency in doing things.

"I see this outdoor movement as a vast picture. At the bottom is darkness, and ascending are layers of increasing light until the sun rays out its full glory above. Struggling, moving and growing all through these layers is humanity—souls in all stages of development. If you catch humanity young enough the chance of letting in the light is greater.

"If we are to develop in America distinctive schools of art, music and handicraft we must lay the foundations on those things which were distinctly American—woodcraft, outdoor life in general, the beautiful customs of the North American Indians and their art and picture writing. These we must first understand.

"Our woodcraft work is founded on the fundamental natural laws which were known to the North American Indians; hence many of their designs and symbols have been used in seeking to get back to the big constructive principles that govern human life. For instance, much symbolism is used. These symbols have their outer meaning for the passerby and their deeper spiritual significance for those who seek it.

"For our people to get the full benefit of the occasional respites from the workaday world that camping trips give they must know the wild by heart, and this can best be done by studying it when young; hence the importance of woodcraft work for boys and girls."

ROOSTER KILLS CHILD.

Fowl Attacked Los Angeles Lad, Who Was Feeding Chickens.

Los Angeles, Cal.—John M. Seaman, two-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Seaman of this city, is dead at Ontario following an attack by a large rooster at the ranch home of the child's grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. V. Lawrence of that city.

John and his mother visited at the ranch. The chickens were a novelty to the boy, and he was anxious to feed them. With prodigious bravery that was thought only childishly cute he accomplished his desire. A few days ago he was so engaged when a large rooster jumped at the little fellow and buried its spurs deeply in his scalp.

Blood poisoning developed, and the child died in a hospital after much suffering.

"MISTAKE" MADE $2,500.

War Brings Profits to Gamer, Who Ordered Too Much Chloride.

Parsons, Kan.—Anton Gamer, a dry cleaner, through a mistake ordered 100 instead of ten gallons of carbon tetrachloride to be used in his cleaning process last February, paying $1.20 a gallon.

He attempted to persuade the drug company to take back the ninety gallons, but it refused, and he figured he had lost over a hundred dollars in the transaction.

The war in the meantime caused the price of the chemical to soar, and recently the chemical company of whom he bought the order paid him $30.15 a gallon for the ninety gallons it refused almost a year ago. Gamer netted a profit of more than $2,500.

RAISE A COW, SWEDE SAYS, AND GET RICH

Treat Her Right and You'll Be Rewarded.

St. Paul.—Raise up a cow in the way she should go, and before she is old she will richly reward you.

C. N. Nelson, who lives just over the Anoka county line, a few miles from St. Paul, says.

Thirty-two years ago, when he was in the early twenties, Nelson landed in Minnesota fresh from Sweden. His total assets were 50 cents and the contents of a queer looking Swedish clothes chest. Half an hour after his arrival he was 50 cents poorer.

"When I got off a train in Minneapolis all I had to direct me was a card bearing the address of a cousin who had come to America a short time before," Mr. Nelson said. "I showed the card to a hackman, who also was Swedish. He took my 50 cents and drove me a few blocks, pointing to one of the windows, marked 444, said, 'There it is.' I had supposed that the 'box 444' written on the card was a street address. I did not know how my cousin was to appear from that box, but I stood with eyes glued on the number from 10 o'clock in the morning until the middle of the afternoon, afraid to look elsewhere for fear my cousin would come in the meantime.

"When at last I heard two men at one of the windows talking my language I told them my story. They explained that I was in the postoffice and that my cousin might not go there for several days. I should have been in a bad fix had not one of the men invited me to come and do odd jobs at his boarding house and earn my keep.

"My cousin did not come to town for three weeks, and when he did he did not help me because he could not. He had all he could do to earn a living.

"Then I worked in a railroad construction camp one summer and returned to the city with the intention of going to school and learning English. My first employer agreed to give me my board for helping with the milking, but I had not gone to school many days when he met with an accident. He persuaded me that I would learn English faster driving a milk route than by going to school, so I became a dairyman and worked until I had saved $1,000."

JUDGE A MODEL MAN.

Eighty-four and Promised Lincoln Not to Smoke, Chew, Drink or Lie.

Chester, Pa.—Federal Judge Simeon Woodrow King of Chicago, who paid a visit to relatives in this city, is a remarkable man. He is in his eighty-fourth year and has never been sick a day in his life.

He was appointed judge for the United States court for the northern district of Illinois when he was twenty-one years and six months of age by President Abraham Lincoln and has been sitting as a jurist all that long period.

"I have kept the promise I made to Abraham Lincoln," Judge King says, "and that promise was that I would never smoke or chew tobacco, never touch liquor and never tell an untruth."

Fifty Years Near Father; Didn't Know.

Columbus, Ind.—Mrs. Margaret Jane Cathers, eighty, of near Newbern, has just learned that she is a daughter of Drewery A. Massey, 108 years old, who recently died in Rush county, and that she lived within fifty miles of him for half a century without knowing his whereabouts.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

The Merchants and Manufacturers Association in Milwaukee had a "Made in Milwaukee" campaign and the following happened during that campaign. A little girl received a nickle from her Daddy and as this so often goes she decided at once to invest this nickle in candy. She walked to a candy store and asked for five cents worth of candy. When the clerk had finished his job and was about to hand the candy over to the girl, she said:—"Is that candy made in Milwaukee?" the clerk answered, "No," and then she said "Well I don't want it then; I want Milwaukee made candy." And the clerk had to satisfy her. This shows what it means when we educate the people to insist on receiving home made goods, whenever that is possible.

The Elks are doing a marvelous work by giving the Minstrels again for the benefit of the Lee Memorial Hospital. This Hospital deserves the backing of every citizen of Fulton and we sincerely hope that ALL THE TICKETS WILL BE SOLD. A city cannot do without an up-to-date Hospital and we should therefore all help as much as we can. Let the Quirk Theatre be sold out for the good of all of us. The Elks are complimented herewith for the good spirit shown.

Why do you expect OTHER people to use FULTON MADE GOODS? Because you want to see your factories stay in your town. BUT, why don't you give the example and show them that you have confidence in your manufacturers and that you want them to stay in the city in which you live; DEMAND THOSE FULTON MADE GOODS AND DO NOT ACCEPT ANYTHING ELSE.

Whenever you go to a store and you cannot get exactly what you want, and the Merchant shows a little indifference (that has happened before, by the way) why not inform the Chamber of Commerce. We may be able to help you.

A Merchant should never try to sell a customer something he or she does not want; if they ask you for a certain article, tell them openly that you do not have it, but will try your very best to get it. That will result in the customer's confidence in you and they will return, because you PLEASED them.

We should like to see every man and woman BUY AT HOME AND DEMAND HOME MADE GOODS and tell THE MERCHANTS TO ADVERTISE AT HOME.

German Crown Prince Says U. S. Munitions Prolong the War

Augustus F. Beach, correspondent for the International News Service, furnishes the following concerning his conversation with the German Crown Prince:

Berlin (via Sayville).—I have today had an unique interview with the German Crown Prince, who is leading his army in France.

I had telegraphed the Crown Prince from Berlin, sending him New Year's greetings and inquiring whether in his opinion the great war would be brought to a close in 1916. Answering my telephone in my room in the Adlon Hotel at 10 o'clock this morning, I was informed that his Imperial Highness, the Crown Prince, was calling from German General Headquarters in France.

I had often heard the Crown Prince described as a "royal democrat." Here was ample proof of the fitness of the title.

An aide first asked me if I preferred to speak English. Answering in the affirmative, I was at once connected with the Crown Prince. After exchanging greetings the Crown Prince said, speaking perfect English very distinctly:

"I wish to answer your question, Mr. Beach, about the prospects of the war ending during the present year. I can say that I am convinced that we shall win in the end, just as I was convinced a year ago that we would win.

"It is difficult to say whether our victory will be proclaimed in the 1916, but of the ultimate outcome I have no doubt."

I then inquired as to the morale of the German troops whether they shared this confidence. The Crown Prince replied:

"They are more convinced than ever that they are fighting to victory."

Having in mind the continuing decisive German successes, I asked the Crown Prince what in his opinion would be the chief factor in prolonging the war. He answered directly and pleasantly, without trace of rancor:

"It is a great pity that your country is sending weapons and ammunitions to the enemy armies. THIS IS THE FACTOR THAT PROLONGS THE WAR."

I asked the Crown Prince if American ammunition was being used generally along the front.

"Yes," he replied, "a very great deal of it is now being fired along the entire front."

In spite of this assitance, the Crown Prince said, his lines are invulnerable. "The allies are making no progress whatever on any part of our front," he said.

I quite casually asked His Imperial Highness if there was any fighting of importance in progress this morning.

"No," he replied, "there is no concerted action in progress, but there is spasmodic fighting at different points along the line."

This truly is the report of a soldier, I thought. Having just returned from a visit to the army of the Crown Prince of Bavaria, I know that artillery crashes and rumbles hour after hour, and day after day, dins the accustomed ears and nerves of the soldier, who pays no attention to it and thinks only of concerted action, when a rattling, shrieking fire precedes a charge from the trenches.

There evidently being too little fighting to be worth talking about, the Crown Prince changed the topic to that of the weather. "The weather out here is very bad," he said. "It rains every day and everywhere, and everything is wet."

Answering my query as to the state of his own health, the Crown Prince concluded: "I am enjoying perfect health. I have never felt better in my life."

GERMANS IN VOSGES RECAPURE LOST WORKS

London—The Germans have inflicted a serious defeat on the French in the Vosges. They have retaken the last of the trenches of the Hartsmannsweiler Popf region, which the French on December 21 stormed and captured with great losses.

Twenty officers, 1083 chasseurs and fifteen machine guns fell into the hands of the Germans with the re-conquered position, according to the German official report issued in Berlin tonight.

The French admit their defeat in a communication issued by the War Office tonight.

The "withdrawal," as they term it, was due to the capture by the Germans of a hill near Hirzstein, north of and commanding Hartmanns-Weilerkopf. This in its turn, commands the main lines of communication to the upper Rhine Valley.

Since the French took this important stronghold, the hill and its network of trenches, the Germans have never ceased in their efforts to recapture it. Strong reinforcements have been hurried from other sectors and some of theh eaviest German artillery has been emplaced to drive out the French.

Bull Moose to Meet in Chicago, Object is to "Rock the Boat"

Chicago—If the men who believe they control the Progressive National Committee have their way, the Bull Moose National Convention will be held in Chicago on the same date as the republican—June 7. The committee will meet here on Tuesday and the matter will be decided then. Some highly interested political gossip is to be heard from the progressive politicians who are already here. George W. Perkins will arrive tomorrow. During the meeting it is likely to be known whether the progressive party will seek to re-establish its one-time militancy or just quietly and with as little awkwardness as possible, be absorbed by the republicans.

I learned tonight from an unquestionable source that the tentative programme of the progressive leaders is:—

To call their Convention here for June 7.

To sit alongside the boat with the republicans and rock it if the republicans don't "behave."

To stampede the regular Convention for Mr. Roosevelt, if possible.

To indorse Justice Hughes, if he accepts the nomination from the republicans.

To nominate their own ticket if any of the other men now mentioned is nominated.

To force their nomination, if possible, on Mr. Roosevelt, if they go through with then omination scheme, but to take some one else, presumably Hiram Johnson, if Mr. Roosevelt declines.

When Mr. Roosevelt would consent to be the nominee of his party in the event that the republicans named Mr. Burton or one of the others upon whom a progressive prohibition has been placed, is a question the progressives now here cannot answer. They are inclined to think he would not. They believe this on the theory that his hatred for President Wilson is so intense he would not do anything to make his re-election certain. That a third ticket headed by Mr. Roosevelt might do so is believed in view of what happened before.

RUSSIANS CAPTURE LINE AFTER LINE OF TRENCHES

London—The Times' Petrograd correspondent, who is at Russian headquarters, says he learns that the Russian blow in Galicia and Bessarabia was projected with great secrecy as a strategic means for helping the Entente Allies in the Balkans, but that, as in previous movements of the sam ekind, the Germans got wind of it and began immediately to withdraw their troops from the Danube.

"The recent conference in Sofia, in which Field Marshall von Mackensen urged the Bulgarians to continue their march on Salonica," says the correspondent, "should be intrepreted in the light of this withdrawal. The Germans were doubtful whether the Bulgars would pursue the adventure once Field Marshal von Mackensen's troops were gone, but they were obliged to withdraw them as the Russian offensive could not be gainsaid."

The correspondent pays tribute to the remarkable recuperative power the Russians have displayed "in the formation of the magnificent forces now assembled along the Austro-German front."

They are, he says, well supplied with ammunition, "in contrast to thep osition a year ago, when they were reduced to one shell a day per gun."

It would be premature, the correspondent adds, to draw hard and fast conclusions on the result of the present movement, and many a feint and parry is is likely to be witnessed before Generals Ivanoff and von Mackensen and Archduke Joseph Ferdinand come to decisive blows.

A slight frost, the correspondent concludes, has improved the roads without stopping entrenching operations, and the Russians are capturing line after line of Teutonic trenches.

"The Austrian General Pflanzer's forces fought under terrible conditions in the neighborhood of Buczacz, East Galicia," says the Times' Petrograd correspondent. "The sudden thaw after the cold snap filled the trenches with water, and only the splendid qualtities of the German soldiers saved the situation in thei ace of the unexampled difficulties."

The correspondent and also the Times' Balkan correspondent dwell on the importance of the town of Sadagora, which the Russians are now approaching and which lies a few miles northeast of Czernowitz, as it is the junction or roads radiating in five directions. The population of the whole district has taken refuge in Czernowitz, which is full of Austrian wounded.

The correspondents say the town is strangly fortified, but that it is not expected to hold out long, as provisions are becoming scarce.

How Gene Field Resigned.

When Eugene Field was working on the old Kansas City Times, according to the story told by a Kansas City man who knew him, the Denver Tribune decided to make a bid for his services. This was in Field's youth, when his fame was just budding and before his flowering period in Chicago. The Denver paper obtained Field's services, as is well known, and the Kansas City man who tells the story was instrumental in bringing it about. He came here from Denver, authorized to offer Field a larger salary. Field was sitting at his desk, coat off, collar loosened, his feet in carpet slippers. The messenger transmitted the Denver offer, and Field, without commenting on it, began to inquire after mutual friends and acquaintances. Meanwhile Field took off his carpet slippers and began drawing on his shoes.

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" said the visitor impatiently, referring to the offer which Field so far had not commented on.

"The devil, man," said Field as he stood up and threw his discarded slippers into a far corner. "Can't you see I'm resigning now?"—Kansas City Star.

"Life."

A crust of bread and a corner to sleep in;
A minute to smile and an hour to weep in;
A pint of joy to a peck of trouble,
And never a laugh, but moans come double,
And that is life.

A crust and a corner that love makes precious,
With the smiles to warm and the tears to refresh us,
And joy seems sweeter when cares come after,
And a moan is the finest of foils for laughter,
And that is life.
—Paul Laurence Dunbar.

Beans!

Senator Hoar used to tell with glee of a southerner just home from a visit to New England who said to his friend: "You know those little white round beans?" "Yes," replied the friend, "the kind we feed to our horses?" "The very same. Well, do you know, suh, that in Boston the enlightened citizens take those little white round beans, boil them for three or four hours, mix them with molasses and I know not what other ingredients, bake them, and then—what do you suppose they do with the beans?"

"They"—

"They eat 'em, suh," interrupted the first southerner impressively. "Suh, they eat 'em!"

The "Long" Sitzes.

The Sitze family was long in person, long drawn out in speech and eternally long about doing things. Over miles of pine hills they were known as the "long" Sitzes. Miss Lydia, the eldest, went to a crossroads store to buy Christmas presents. In the course of a half hour she became interested in some blue and scarlet petticoats.

"I'll take one of these petticoats," she said, slowly counting out the price.

The busy proprietor wrapped up the parcel and handed it over with a polite "Something else?"

"I'll take another petticoat."

He did up a second bundle, took her carefully counted money and was turning to the next impatient customer.

"I'll take another petticoat," came the slow drawl.

This went on to the seventh time. The man, being up to his ears in work, ventured a question:

"Buying for the neighborhood, Miss Lydia?"

"I'm buying two apiece for my sisters."

"How many sisters have you?"

"Nine."—Youth's Companion.

Gems of Architecture.

The three buildings which are considered the finest examples of colonial architecture in the United States are the city hall in New York, the state house in Boston and Independence hall in Philadelphia.

ON THE FULTON ROAD

Did you ever carry a lantern coming home late in the dark? Small lanterns never threw the light very far, but with each step forward it was light ahead to your own gate. You never could get a lantern to light up the whole way the moment you started. You did not need such a lantern. Nor do you need to bother much about the lights and shadows cast by those who seek to ruin your proposition so that their selfish ends may be attained. In facing the battle line we should concern ourselves most of alll about lighting up the lantern of our minds. We do not need to shoulder the whole responsibility at once. If we but persevere we shall find that the way to accomplishment lightens and brightens as we step along, and then we can say to our friends in darkness, "Strike a light."

Only a few weeks have passed since Fulton started on the lighted road. At the time we carried a very small lantern, but we did not want one that would light up the whole way the moment we started. We anticipated obstacles in the road, but what of them? We were on the right road and the lantern we held was sufficient to give us light. Obstacles remain in the road, but the light of perseverence works marvels. If we persevere in trying to smooth out the road, it can be said at some time by our biographers, "the people of Fulton in 1916 relied upon deeds rather than years to build up their community." Many successful men have died young, but they lived lives of deeds rather than years.

DEVELOPING EFFICIENCY

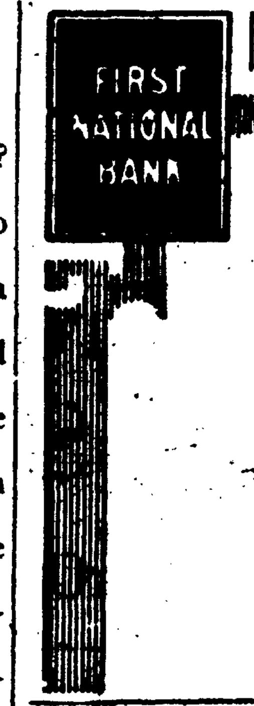
The entire community is interested in developing to the fullest degree the capabilities of every individual, and the possibilities of thus increasing production and wealth, and thereby increasing trade, enlarging the distribution of comforts and raising the standard of living, are evidently enormous. It is a habit of mind to think of the things with which we are familiar as fixed and certain. The work man thinks of the amount of work to be done as a certain quantity, the employer thinks of an average day's work as yielding a given product, and the wholec community thinks of each individual's earnings as something that concerns nobody but himself, while the fact is that all of these quantities must be constantly changing if progress is made, and everybody is interested in promoting such changes.

In the same sense that the countries of South America must be large producers in order to be large purchasers, our own people individually must be large producers in order to be large consumers; and in the same sense that it will pay to develop the capabilities of South America it will pay to develop the capabilities of our own people. There doubtless are greater trade possibilities at home than abroad, but neither field need be neglected for the other.

There are many significant signs that indicate a growing appreciation of thec ommon interest in enlarged production. The increasing cost of food and other agricultural products in recent years, offsetting as it has in large degree the progress made in other lines of industry, has prompted widespread efforts to develop more scientific methods in agriculture. Railroad companies led in this work, but manufacturers of farm implements, bankers and others have followed zealously. The American Bankers' Association, through its committee headed by Mr. B. F. Harris, of the First National Bank of Champaign, Illinois, has been publishing an excellent monthly, the "Banker-Farmer," which is given wide circulation through the members of the Association. The Illinois Bankers' Association has been giving up its meetings and practically all of the energies of its organization, through its efficient secretary, Mr. R. L. Crampton, to the promotion of agriculture, and this month will hold a several days' conference in Chicago, upon the subject of "Community Development." Other bankers' associations are doing similar work, and under the stimulus of these efforts the individual bankers in their local communities are personally giving aid in the purchase of high bred stock, the employment of competent county agents or advisors, the circulation of instructive literature and by other means.

The good of all this is apparent. If the farms can be made more productive, and the process of delivery from producer to consumer can be simplified, the benefits will reach everybody, and similar benefits are to be had from increased production and improved organization in all other fields.—Bank News.



A MAN MAY SUCCEED WITHOUT BEING A GENIUS

Determination is an indispensable factor in climbing the ladder of success. One need not be a genius to succeed financially, but he must be determined in his efforts to save his money.

The best way to accumulate money is to have an account with the First National Bank of Fulton. It will help you cultivate that good habit of making regular deposits.

HOW OFFICE BOYS GET ON

Good office boys are about as rare as great statesmen. A New York lawyer found one, and the boy is now going through Columbia University at his employer's expense. The lawyer was partial to a certain make of steel pen and liked to have a fresh one in his penholder every morning. The boy learned of this and made it a point to keep the desk supplied.

"I sent the kid to college," the lawyer said the other day, "because he was the only human being who knew or cared what made work easiest for me."

No office boys will read this—they read only the sporting pages—therefore, they cannot take the lesson to heart, and employers must worry along as usual until they, perchance find a jewel who can discover for himself the way to deserve promotion.—Philadelphia Ledger.

ANOTHER DAYTON WAY

Dayton, O., described as "a city which has lately formed the habit of choosing its municipal officers on issues unrelated to the tariff and Philippine independence," is making an apparently successful trial of a variation of the parole system. A man who is sentenced to the workhouse is told that if he conducts himself properly he will be turned over to the Municipal Parole Board. This Board does not content itself with a mechanical arrangement of names and dates and record of conduct, but first finds out what the prisoner can do and seeks a job for him. The man on parole then goes to work in the morning as if he lived at home, returning to the workhouse in the evening. On Saturday night he brings his wages in the envelope, sealed to the superintendent, who opens it in the presence of members of the prisoner's family and distributes its contents as he sees fit. With poetic justice, the plan is said to york especially well inc ases where the prisoner is serving a sentence for non-support of his family. The story is told of one man, convicted on this charge, that he has taken care of his family, paid his pressing debts, saved $100, and has two months still to serve. The great advantage of the system is thought to be its inculcation of regular habits in the prisoners. There are obvious incidental advantages, also, such as the preservation of normal life for the men theoretically within prison walls, and the consequent likelihood of their reformation.—N. Y. Post.

GOOD LESSONS

Judging from what one may read, the city of Dayton, Ohio, is giving more attention to the study of municipal science than any other city in the country, and that it is receiving benefit through this investigation and study cannot be doubted. Dayton has reached a point where it "chooses its municipal offices on issues unrelated to the tariff and Philippine independence," and the town that has come to such a point in its history is on the high road to permanent and steady improvement and increasing prosperity. The system of changing officials simply because they happen to be members of one party or the other is all wrong when it comes to municipal control. There should never be but one platform for a city, and the chief and only plank in that should be—Our city; we pledge, ourselves to give it the best thought, the best service that can be produced.

It is now beginning to be realized more clearly than ever before that there is in the nation, in the States, in the counties, cities and towns, no party or organization that wishes to do anything to injure the particular political division in which they labor. Every party is desirous of seeing its administration successful. That is the universal aim. But every party is monarchial at heart. The desire for success in administration does not extend beyond party lines. Interviews given by defeated candidates many express cordial hopes for the success of the lucky competitor, but all the time there is a hope that the ins will make some sort of blunder or failure that will turn the voters against them and give the outs a grab at the patronage. The evil of all government is the squabble for patronage, and if some system might be invented that would put a stop to the very wide spread desire and effort on the part of people to lay hold upon "a fat public job" of some kind, the administration of cities, counties, States and nations would be a simple and very much more satisfactory thing. But the desire for a job is there. It is the mainspring of all party effort, and no party admits that the members of any other party know how to transact or conduct any governmental function whatever. Men of all political faiths engage in business, and it would be very difficult indeed to prove that a man's politics had any influence what ever in bringing either success or failure. Republican and Democratic employes are quite alike in calibre and accomplishment, and except in extreme and offensive instances the employer who would discharge an employe because of difference in politics would be regarded as a person of very poor judgment. But when we come to the business of the public—all of which is very much like private business—we are narrow partizans, and for some reason or another insist that persons chosen from the party of our especial faith shall be put in charge of all official transactions. Possibly the man who holds a position is trained for that especial work; it may be that he is one of those rare persons who yet, having a "political job" still accomplishes good work and gives the city or state his entire time and very best service; but if he doesn't happen to look through the same political kalaidescope as ourselves, he must be ousted to make way for some one not nearly as efficient, but who votes our ticket.

"If Dayton, Ohio, has broken itself of this habit, and is actually engaged in patient and intelligent research as to how it may best be administered, then it is progressing to very sure and safe ground, and its future is filled with promise.—Utica Observer.

THE FARM BOY

Children on the farms! Bless their souls how abused they are. How do they stand such hardships? Here is the federal children's bureau telling us that three-fifths of the 30,000,000 children in the United States are rural children and that the percentage of illiteracy in rural communities is double that in cities, with diverse dark hints in regard to rural child labor.

Now rural child labor is a topic regarding which the barefooted boy with checks of tan has a few rather decided opinions. Here is a little essay by one of that clan, which speaks for itself:—

"You have wanted to know what I do after school. I pick eggs and get in the wood and I feed the chickens and get hay down for the horses and cows and I get in the straw and and i bed them and i milk some of them and i have to give the cats some milk and i water the chickens and i get in some water in to and i bed the horses and cows and i set the table and i put the knives and forks on then i put the plates on and then i put the saucers and then i put the cups and then i put the sugar on the table and then i put the jallie (jelly) on the table and then i put the spoons on and then i put the honey on the table and then i put the sauce on the table and i pick up chips and i take and set the things in the seller. Then i go to bed and there is nothing more to write about."

So, indeed, he sleeps, and he deserves to sleep well, But there is a future for that boy, rather brighter, we prefer to believe, than the future which awaits the youngsters of his age who have not had his advantages. Compilers of statistics tell us that the proportion of countrybred men who succeed is far higher than that of men born and brought up in the cities. There is something that makes men in the brave, hard, primitive discipline of the farm, with its tasks that include the whole range of trades and occupations and require besides the initiative of the pioneer and the hardihood of the explorer.—Albany Press.

FOODS THE TURKS EAT.

Pilaff Is the National Dish, and but Little Meat Is Used.

Vegetables, fruits and grains are the staples of the Turkish kitchen. Breakfast on the Bosporus consists of a small cup of Turkish coffee and a roll. At noon there is a bowl of sour milk (yaourt) and bread. Thick Turkish coffee is taken again in the afternoon to key up appetites for the principal meal, which comes at night. This meal includes, probably, pilaff (meat and rice), several kinds of vegetables, pastry and thick coffee. The workman's meal is still more simple—a chunk of bread and an onion or a bunch of grapes.

There are, however, some dishes upon the Turkish bill of fare which the returned westerner never ceases to regret. Pilaff is one. It is a food as national with the Turk as the potato with the Irish, as the cabbage with the German. It takes a multitude of forms, but its basic quality, its quality of being pilaff, is derived from rice being cooked in such a way as to preserve each grain firm and distinct. The rice is unpolished and in cooking takes on a gelatinous coat. Sometimes it is boiled in mutton fat, a rich, smooth, inviting dish. Sometimes bits of roast mutton are mingled with it, when it becomes a meat pudding of delicious flavor. It is cooked with small currants and pine nuts, fragrant and spicy. It is stuffed with dates and flavored with orange peel; but, whatever its form, it is one of the treasured memories of a visit to the near east.

Eggplant is the foundation of another favored Turkish dish. It is stuffed with chopped onions and rice and cooked in oil. It is also stuffed with meat marrows and rice and steamed until it becomes a culinary inspiration. The westerner, furthermore, learns to enjoy many of the milk foods prepared by the Turks. Yaourt, cultured milk as thick as sour cream, prepared from the rich milk of the buffalo cow, is a satisfaction to the most pampered diner. Chicken breast milk, made from grated chicken breasts; jelly-like rice milk, starchy pudding, eaten with sugar and rosewater, and yaourt with chopped nutmeats, are other dishes.

The Turks are fond of sweets. They prepare a kind of bread which they soak in honey and eat with rich cream. They also prepare pastry in strings soaked in honey. Meats, with the exception of mutton, are poor in Turkey, but then the Turk is a good deal of a vegetarian.

The Turkish porter, or hamal, dines on a chunk of bread costing a cent, together with a melon or a bunch of grapes or an onion or a piece of cheese, to the cost of another cent, and considers his meal complete. Yet his daily toil consists in carrying packing cases, pianos and other knickknacks around on his back to the astonishment of every visitor acquainted only with the prowess of porters in the west. This rugged Turkish burden bearer eats a dinner at night which costs about 4 cents—a bowl of pilaff with bits of meat in it.—National Geographic Society Bulletin.

EVOLUTION OF A TRADE UNION

How the Boot and Shoe Workers Grew and Prospered.

RECORD OF GOOD SERVICE

Since Control Over Strikes Was Given to the National Organization the Wages of Its Members Have Been Protected—High Dues and Benefits Aids to Success.

The record of the Boot and Shoe Workers' union is one of evolution and service, unity and progress, construction and success, says the Boot and Shoe Workers' Journal.

It did not start under the most auspicious circumstances. We realize this fact better as we look back on its history. It started in April, 1895, with the declaration on the part of the then existing organizations of shoe workers that there should be one union in the trade. But the financial plan of the new organization was weak. It was based upon low dues and a low per capita tax. It was based also on local autonomy. Each local union could do entirely as it pleased and did so. If such action resulted in a strike the national union could not support it, because no provisions had been made. The union was not built that way.

In 1898 the first arbitration contract was made. In 1899 a new constitution was adopted establishing twenty-five cent dues and also establishing sick, death and strike benefits in the control of the national union and giving the national union control over strikes.

In these two years the union changed from a mob to an organized force, and since the year 1899 the union has continually progressed in the direction of becoming constantly of more service and benefit to its members.

During these years of progress and of service since 1899, and in spite of the obstructive work of its enemies in 1903, 1909 and all the time, this union has protected the wages of its members through all periods, especially during the panic of 1907 and again through the long months of prostration owing to the present war in Europe. There has been no such thing as a slaughtering of the wages of the shoemakers since this union became efficient in the year 1899.

In addition to protecting the wages of its members against reduction, this union has been the means of constantly raising them, principally through the working out of the arbitration contract. In thousands upon thousands of instances the mere existence of this agreement to arbitrate has been the means of settling disputes by mutual adjustment and without arbitration and upon terms favorable to the workers. Arbitration cases have been won and arbitration cases have been lost, but mutual adjustments have always been successful.

This union has redeemed every pledge. Every legal sick and death benefit has been paid. Every strike that has been sanctioned has been paid its strike benefit to the end, no matter how long the period was. That strikes have been less numerous is a tribute to the efficiency of the service of the organization through its arbitration and mutual adjustment policy.

This union has won a standing not only in the labor world, but in the shoe world. We are recognized as a factor, and, more than that, we are respected as a labor organization whose word and contract can be depended upon, and this in itself is an asset of no mean value, for when, as a labor organization, we are entitled to the respect of an employer, both because of our disposition and our strength, we are a long way on the road toward a satisfactory adjustment of any honest difference of opinion.

What does this union need for the future? It needs the undivided support of the shoe workers. With that support it can go on to heights of success not yet attained. Its service in the past has been valuable, its accomplishments great, but if this union is given the entire and undivided support of the shoe workers its progress will be still more rapid, its achievements still more great, and the strength of its position for the gaining of further advantages for the shoe workers of the present and future will be rapidly augmented, and the industrial position of this union will become more and more impregnable.

We have said that this union needs the undivided support of the shoe workers. Perhaps it were better to say that every shoe worker in America needs this union, for it has been proved that this union has succeeded and prospered fairly well without the support of a large proportion of shoe workers, who either have not supported any union at all or have done worse and supported independent factions. But how has it gone with the shoe workers who have remained aloof? They have not progressed in like proportion, and the most that can be said for them today is that they are a menace to the further progress of this organization and to their own.

This union will continue to progress and to give more and better service to its members anyway. Its progress will not be so fast as if the workers of the craft rallied to its standard, but it is bound to progress anyway, rapidly if permitted, but slowly if it must, because it has got into that habit.

THE MYSTERIOUS EAGLE.

On the broad top of a stony, rain gullied hill in middle Georgia there lies a very large eagle, concerning which conflicting stories are told. The one point that seems to be certain is that the Indians left the eagle as a legacy to the state. A hundred years from now it will probably be found lying on its back, with outspread wings and tail, even as it lies today. For it is made of quartz rocks so cunningly placed that it would require a pick in a strong man's hands to displace any one of them. The rocks lap and overlap in such a manner as to represent feathers. No cement holds them in position, and the stones vary in size, weighing from a half pound to three or four pounds. The image rests on a very firm foundation, for the stonework extends several feet into the ground.

Once, perhaps twice, treasure seeking vandals dug into the breast of the eagle, but the work must have proved too laborious, for the diggers gave up before they had reached the bottom layer of overlapping stones.

Rough but fairly accurate measurements of the bird show the length of the eagle from the middle of the tail to the head to be 102 feet and from tip to tip of outspread wings 120 feet. The length of the beak is ten feet, and the height of the body at the center of the breast is ten feet. The eagle lies with its head to the west.

Tradition does not give any satisfactory explanation of the age or the meaning of the great stone mound. It may have had religious significance to the red men who built it, and it may be the burial place of some great chief. It is one of the most mysterious and most interesting of prehistoric monuments in the United States.—Youth's Companion.

The season of skating is suffering a slight break at the present but the weather-man when consulted by followers of the art advised preparing for more of the real weather soon.

The new rink opened at the foot of Pratt street, and on the old canal, has for the past few days been a favorite place for the skaters. It is well protected from the winds by the high banks on each side. Lake Neahtawanta has also sent out her call and though it is early in the season several have glided away the hours upon the polished surface.

The ice carnival to be held as soon as weather condition permit, will undoubtedly attract several hundred skaters from greater Fulton.

PUBLIC WORK WELL IN HAND

Governor Recommends Far-Reaching Reforms While Department Heads Report Increased Revenues---Expenditures Lowered.

Albany—Speaker Sweet preached an effective little sermon in half a dozen lines when he opend the work of the 1916 session of the Legislature.

"My experience in business," said he "has taught met hat the only way to acomplish results is by diligent pursuit of the work in hand. This rule will apply in legislation as in any other business. It is my purpose to announce your committees at once and thus indicate my desire to encourage in every way a prompt performance of our duties."

Having said that he announced his committees and as a result the Assembly of 1916 is organized and ready for business about ten days earlier than usual.

The Senate organization of last year continues without change and as a large number of the Senators have been steadily engaged on important constructive work throughout the past year the upper house is in position to transact a large amount of work without the usual delay.

Able Men in Charge

While there are a number of changes in the personnel of the Assembly, thei mportant committees are headed by men of experience and ability. Simon L. Adler who succeeds Harold J. Hinman as the Republican floor leader is now beginning his sixth term and somes to the work well prepared. For five years he has served on the most importtant committees of the house, is a hard worker and is thoroughly conversant with the difficult duties of his now position. With Speaker Sweet and William J. Maier, chairman of the ways and means committee, Mr. Adler will constitute the majority of the committee on rules the most important committee in the house.

Governor's Business-like Message

Governor Whitman's message to the Legislature maps out a large share of that body's work for the session. It deals almost exclusively with the subject of state finance and recommends some very important changes in the laws governing the transaction of the state's business. It was accomplished by a tentative budget, prepared by the Governor's special budget conference, which gives the Legislature a minutely detailed statement of the needs of ever ydepartment of the state government for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1916. The Governor's plan calls for changing thec ommencement of the fiscal year from October 1 to July 1 to facilitate the doing away with the annual supply bill. The message recommends the abolition of the office of the health officer of thep ort of New York, the board of port wardens of the port of New York, and the New York State Nautical School and subject to the report of the special commissioner appointed to investigate the departments assisting in the administration of the state charitable institutions, the abolition of the office of Fiscal Supervisor of State Charities. The message also recommends constitutional amendments to provide for serial bonds and to give the Governor power to reduce items in appropriation bills. The abandonment of the Mahansic state hospitl and the State Training School for Boys at Yorktown Heights is recommended as is the providing of additional accommodations for the aged insane at the Middletown state hospital. The message points out that the control of stae funds is shared with the comptroller by fifty-seven county treasurers and eight state departments and recommends the centralization of financial control in the office of the comptroller. The message is short and very business-like.

Receipts Increasing—Expenditures Decreasing

The business-like tone that characterizes the Governor's message also characterizes the department reports that have been submitted. A reduction of $130,000 in expenses is reported by the Comptroller, the Department of Public Works can get along with $550,000 less than last year and the Department of Highways can do dith a decrease of $400,000.

An increase in the receipts from the stock transfer tax from $2,075,778.42 in 1912 to $3,540,334.24 in 1915 is reported by the Comptroller who also mentions that he discovered an illegal traffic in these stamps and arrested and prosecuted the offender. Great improvement took place in the income of the state during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1915 and the comptroller looks for a continuation of this improvement during the present year.

To Simplify the Tax Law

An increase of $203,693,515 in taxation valuations over the valuations established in 1914 is reported by the State Tax Commission as the result of the commission's effort to see that real property is assessed at its proper value. The commission makes a number of recommendations for the revision of the tax law so as to simplify and make more efficient its administration. It recommends the repeal of the secured debts law, the prevention of the use of savings banks for the purpose of evading taxation advancing the dates covering the work of assessors, combining into one the separate hearings on full valuation andequalization of special franchise tax property, requiring the commissioners of equalization to use the rules set forth in section 50 of the tax law, providing that all real right of appeal to them ayor of a city in the matter of equalization tax on corporations.

The Trouble With New York City

While the committee, headed by Senator Brown, to investigate conditions in New York city to determine what legislation ,if any is necessary to afford relief to the city in relation to taxation for local or state purposes, has not yet completed its work, it has gone far enough to reveal the cause of thepresent unfortunate condition and to point out the remedy. In a speech before the Republican Club in New York, Chairman Brown of the Committee said:

"Grown poor by extravagance the city must regain its former position of financial strength by economy. It must learn that wealth is more easily squandered than acquired, and that no accumulation or resources, however great, are immune to waste. Sound and conservative methods are even more becoming to boundless yealth than irresponsibility. Economy and retrenchment are not enough. What New York needs is the axe. The policy of doing everything for everybody has broken down. There is not money enough. Better go slower and keep solvent. If the city keeps solvent itw ill grow faster."

Referring to the complaint made by the New York city administration of the money it has to raise for state purposes, Senator Brown said:

"Public attention shall no longer be diverted from the ninety four per cent of its budget for municipal affairs to the six per cent in its budget for state affairs."

BILL WOULD PERMIT SALE OF CANAL LAND

Senator J. Henry Walters, who is preparing a bill for the sale of abandoned canal lands and structures which will meet conditions in Rochester, Buffalo, Syracuse and other canal cities, scaid in Syracuse a day or two ago that the co-operation of state officials in solving the question acceptably to localities, and at the same ime in a way that protects the state, had been assured. Theb ill will be introduced early to admit of general discussion.

Senator Walters had a conference with Engineer Frank M. Williams in Albany last week and the subject was gone over in detail. The measure that was vetoed by Governor Whitman last year will be revised. Drafts of the bill are to be submitted to State Engineer Williams, State Superintendent Wotherspoon and organizations in this city and Buffalo that the interested in the disposal of canal lands.

It is said that the situation in Syracuse is becoming acute. The abandment of the old canals in Syracuse, it is said, would save the city about $30,000 annually, now paid for bridge tenders. It is believed, says a Syracuse newspaper, that such conditions will aid in the enactment of a general law. The state engineers's office has completed a survey of the lands in Syracuse preparatory to abandonment and sale.

MINSTRELSY ON THE BOARDS AT THE QUIRK

Just what a good reputation is worth to an attraction is always illustrated when the John W. Vogel Minstrels come to Fulton, and as usual there was a large audience out Tuesday evening to greet him and his show at the Academy of Music. Mr. Vogel calls his attraction "Japland" this year and stages a good portion of it to fit the title, and does it wholly acceptably, but the name of Vogel is so closely associated with minstrelsy to make any other title fit very closely, and so it was just plain Vogel's Minstrels, as in former years, presented with all the elaboration that has marked former programmes given here, and with a fund of new things that were bright and pleasing.

The staging was very elaborate and the first part, showing the "Milado's realm," was beautiful and alone brought a round of applause when the curtain wasl ifted. There was so much to the show that it would be almost flat to attempt an enumeration that could no be made complee, but it may be said with assurance that the large audience went away more than satisfied and will be glad to be on hand when Mr. Vogel brings his show this way again.

Dates Over the Ocean.

The raising of dates is the greatest industry of the Euphrates valley. Autumn is a feverish time among the date merchants. Then the dates are ripe and are loaded on to the ocean steamers at Busreh, and the boats race down the Persian gulf, across the Indian ocean, up the Red sea, along the Mediterranean and across the Atlantic, to be the first to arrive with the delicious fruit. Once I sailed directly from Busreh to New York on one of the annual date steamers, a journey of forty-two days.—Christian Herald.

BOWLERS HAVE BIG WEEK AHEAD

Leaders Match Skill Tonight ---Jogalongs Show Prospects of Moving to Head of the Line.

The past week in the City Bowling league saw a change in the holder of first place on three different occasions —after each game. The present week opens with a match tonight between the Nondescripts and West Sides, both of whom are tied for first place. It has been an impossibility so far to get a line on the possible winning team of the league owing to the uncestain bowling of a number of the individual members of the team. Even the tailenders, the Jogalongs, are by no means out of the running and it would not surprise the bowlers if the Jogalongs made their way into the first division within the next fort night. Thursday night the Jogalongs bowl the Onyx A. C., with the first-named team conceded as the winners of the match.

Van Buren, with a record of 245 pins, took the prize for last week. He was followed respectively by Rathburn, score 240, and Rear, 231. No amateur prize was awarded owing to the inability of the youthful bowlers to reach the 200 mark, which is necessary to be in the running for the amateur prize of $1.00.

On Saturday night, teams representing the Fort Stanwix Company and Chocolate Works rolled a match, in which the former took all three games. The Canning Company team wasm ade up of Tryon, Blake, Seeton Battles and Todd, while the Chocolate Works was represented by Aston, Wood, Gillette, Broner and Robarge.

The present standing of the teams in the City Bowling League is as follows:

| Team | Won | Lost | P. C. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Nondescripts .... | 11 | 7 | .611 |
| West Side ....... | 11 | 7 | .611 |

MAN AND WIFE SHIPPED AS EXPRESS MATTER

Buffalo—Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Ansoni have just arrived at Beach Ridge, a hamlet about five miles east of this city, after a trip from Italy, via Boston, Mass. They made the last leg of their journey as charges of the American Express company, tags being attached to them, giving their names and destination. Frank Dorse, a brother of Mrs. Ansoni, an employe at the Central Clay Products company's brick plant at eBach Ridge, brought the couple here from Italy. They were shipped by express from Boston to Beach Ridge to overcome any danger of their losing their way in travelin gon railroad trains. The scheme worked out most successfully.

FORESTERS CALLED UPON TO ADDRESS MEETINGS IN MANY PARTS OF COUNTRY

On January 6 Professor John W. Stephen of The New York State College of Forestry at Syracuse addressed the Vermont Maple Sugar Makers Association at Brattleboro, Vt., on the "Maple Sugar Orchard, its Growth and Preservation." In his address Professor Stephen emphasized the fact that trees and grass cannot be produced successfully on the same ground at the same time. He said in part: "Thrifty forest growth can be maintained only where the crowns of the trees shade the ground sufficiently to prevent the growth of grass. The crowns of mature trees grow thinner as theyg row older and foresters have been growing beech, maple or other shade enduring species as an under-story to prolong proper growing conditions. The young growth may add somewhat to the expense of future sugar production, but a system of roads and paths can be established that will minimize this expense. A dense border of trees or shrubs should be maintained around a sugar bush so as to keep the leaves within the forest. If the sugar bush becomes too open with too heavy a covering of sod upon the soil the trees will deteriorate rapidly and the value of thes ugar bush both for sugar and for timber is soon passed.

At the Annual Meeting of the American Civic Association held in Washington December 28-30, Henry R. Francis, Assistant Professor of Landscape Extension of the State College of Forestry at Syracuse, gave an address on "How New York Educates its People Through its Landscape Extension Service." The Washington Evening Star of December 31, 1915, heads a column referring to the address by Professor Francis with the statement, "Thinks City's Trees Models for Nation," and follows by a statement that Professor Francis pointed out that—"civic art is gradually finding its way into rural districts. It is absolutely essential if we wish for shade trees that these trees be planted with due consideration of their relation to their present surroundings and the surroundings 25 years from now. Therefore it has been necessary in the Landscape Extension work of the College of Forestry at Syracuse to begin in educating the people to consider planning for the planting of rural roadsides, village and city streets, recreation areas, playgrounds and other public areas."

"It is rather a rare phenomenon today for a rural School Board to consider the landscaping of a school ground. Too often the services of a soliciting nursery agent are enlisted to lay out the grounds with the result that the land is spotted with geometrically shaped beds of brightly colored foliage plants and highly inflamed flowers. Possibly the nursery agent won out in the competition and the school ground became a museum for the display of horticultural freaks and monstrosities. The children of the community, and to a large degree their parents, look to the school grounds and to public grounds that are planted for suggestions as to home grounds. How much better it would have been for the community if the school authorities could have engaged the services of an expert from a State educational institution and secured effects that would add to the beauty of thec ommunity for all time to come. The matter of civic art in the country is just now purely and simply a problem of education and this education can be brought about it seems to the College most effectively by practical demonstrations on school grounds and grounds about public buildings."

DARK HORSE MAY FEATURE GAME

Maccabee Five Sees Championship Flag in the Distance---Much Depends Upon Who's Who in Line.

Basketball of a high order will be presented Wednesday night at Church's Hall when the Oswego Normal five, inculding Landers the star center, will oppose the local Maccabee five in a tilt for championship honors of Oswego county.

With victories over what are conceded to be the two best amateur teams of Oswego already registered, a win over the school team will clinch the title for the Maccabees.

The largest crowd of the season is expected to witness the match and adequate seating facilities will be at hand. The invincible Boy Scouts will have it out with the Phoenix High school five in the preliminary.

After the High school—Oswego Normal game of Friday night, the management of the visiting team stated that a player the equal of Landers might be seen in the next lineup. This man was kept on the sidel ines during Friday's game. It is understood that the dark horse has a reputation for brilliancy in shooting baskets from the foul line. In this department of the game, Landers cannot be very far surpassed as he rarely missed a shot in the last game.

The duel between Crockett and Landers should be interesting as both men have battled for forty minutes with the results about even. Landers played center on the Mohawk outfit, which was defeated by the local team, and he gathered eight baskets during the game. To offset this Crockett himself caged seven, leaving the honors to Landers by a marrow margin.

NEW HAVEN JURY ACQUITS SIX MEN

New York—After fifty-one hours of isolatio and conference the jury in the United States Court which held in its hands the fate of the eleven members of the old New Haven Board who stood accused of conspiracy under the Sherman Anti-trust law returned a verdict at half-past four o'clock yesterday afternoon. Their deliverance was recorded as set forth above, six of the defendants being acquitted, while the jury reported that it found it impossible to reach an agreement upon the other five. Judge William H. Hunt accepted the verdict and discharge the twelve men who have been listening to the evide in the case since October 13 last with the thanks of the Court.

My Most Important Law Case

By JOHN Y. LARNED

My most important law case? If you mean the most important case to me individually, it was a case of breach of promise. It was a case where a woman sued a man for refusing to keep a contract of marriage and to settle on her at the same time $100,000. The strange feature was that the man, who was madly in love with the plaintiff, was as madly desirous to marry her, but claimed that he hadn't the $100,000 to give her.

My first interpretation of the case was that the woman was trying to bleed a man without having ever had any intention to marry him; my second was that she had a passion for getting men in love with her. Fitz Mooney, the defendant, in a written appeal for Kate Jackson, plaintiff, to marry him, had agreed to settle $100,000 on her if she would do so. He had at the time made twice that amount on the Stock Exchange, but had lost it all. For some reason that the lady kept to herself, knowing that he was unable to keep the financial part of his contract, she sued him on the agreement.

Kate Jackson was a widow, not especially good looking, but possessing a magnetism over men that enabled her to do what she pleased with them. She came into my office a stranger to me, offered me her case, and I was convinced from the first that she was simply desirous of annoying Mr. Fitz Mooney, though what was her object in doing so I could not imagine. There was nothing to be got out of him, and I convinced her of the fact—if she was not convinced already—but she insisted on proceeding with the case. Since I was then struggling to gain a practice and with poverty at the same time, I consented; but not before the lady had paid me $100 retaining fee.

I was soon sorry that I had accepted it. I had spent it. I was unable to get rid of my client by returning it. Never have I had such an annoying case. Mrs. Jackson did not give me her confidence, and I was continuously in doubt as to what she was driving at. Instead of my managing the case for her she was managing the plaintiff through me. Her ground of action was that she had declined several offers of rich men to accept the defendant, that he had won her affections, her other suitors had been married, died, disappeared or failed to propose again. She had thus been deprived of a pick of several fortunes. She proved these assertions by showing me love letters from these parties, and on inquiry I learned that they were rich men. What I did not learn was that they were not still available as husbands.

Half a dozen times I had the case ready to be tried, and every time something occurred to cause delay. Once the plaintiff, who was always speculating, having made $50,000 in wheat, offered to settle it all on her and marry her as well if she would accept the compromise. She peremptorily declined. The money was soon lost in copper, and my client to my surprise seemed suddenly mortified and showed signs of dropping the suit. I foolishly showed her a letter from the defendant, who was getting worn out as I was with the case, upbraiding her, whereupon she turned square about and demanded the whole amount for which she had sued, asking me if she could not double the claim.

Meanwhile my bills for services and costs were growing. The widow paid my bills promptly, but the costs went on accumulating. I reminded her that she would probably lose in the end, getting, if anything, a nominal award and would have to pay the court as well as my professional fees. But this did not stagger her in the least. The summer was coming on, and she went into the country, whence reports came that she had enthralled every man who came near her. I was in hopes that she would be snared herself and drop her case against Fitz Mooney. No such good luck. The last week in August she wrote me that she would return immediately after Labor day and desired that I would be ready to bring her suit to trial as soon thereafter as possible.

But when she returned a change had come for Fitz Mooney. He had sunk a lot of money in cotton, and on winding up his deals the account showed that he owed his broker $75,000. This was not all. His troubles, largely his affairs with the widow, had broken down his health, and he was lying very ill in a hospital.

Such was his condition when the plaintiff sailed in to my office and asked me if I was ready to try his case. I replied by giving her a brief account of Fitz Mooney's misfortunes, adding that I feared he would die before we could get judgment.

"Oh, my goodness gracious!" was the response.

Never have I seen a more sudden collapse. She begged me to call a cab at once, and when it came, apparently oblivious of me, she ran down to it and drove to the hospital.

That is the last I saw of her till after Fitz Mooney had recovered and I attended the wedding. I have seen much of the perversities of the fair sex, but nothing like this. I learned later on that the couple had been engaged and had had a spat occasioned by a criticism of Fitz Mooney of his fiancee's accepting an attention from another man. Out of this grew the whole trouble.

IT WAS A BIG ORDER.

But He Caught His Breath In Time to Save the Situation.

That familiar things have different names in different countries was discovered by an Englishman while he was visiting the United States. Thus he tells the story of the watermelons:

I was eating dinner in an eastern city and saw on the menu, "Watermelon." We have watermelons in England, but they are what you in America call "muskmelons." Therefore I called the waiter and said, "Bring me two watermelons."

The dusky waiter's eyes grew large, and he protested:

"But, sah, you don't want two watamelons!"

I am not accustomed to have waiters tell me what I want. I knew perfectly well what I wanted. I saw some people at the next table smile at each other, and I was vexed. Therefore I replied to the waiter with much dignity:

"I GAVE MY ORDER"

"I want two watermelons."

The waiter seemed about to protest again, but I gave him a cold, steely look, and he thought better of it and went away. While he was gone I looked round and found every one within hearing distance smiling curiously. Looking further, I saw another waiter setting down before another man a plate containing an immense round of something green outside and bright red within. Then I spied my own waiter returning, bearing on each uplifted palm an immense green oval. No wonder the people smiled! The smile was about to become a laugh. I thought I should die! Then an idea came to me! When the waiter reached my place I looked at his burden quite judicially, tapped each of those elephantine "watermelons," and then I gave my order in a calm, decided tone:

"Bring me a slice from this one."—Youth's Companion.

Life's Battle.

He who is silent is forgotten; he who stops is overwhelmed, distanced, crushed; he who ceases to grow greater becomes smaller; he who leaves off gives up.—Henri Frederic Amiel.

Can't Please Everybody.

The manager of an asbestos mill conceived a novel idea for his announcements. He had them printed on thin asbestos and inclosed in envelopes of the same material. As he was uncertain of the correct addresses of some of the stockholders, he ordered his stenographer to write on each envelope "Please Forward."

The idea was clever, but one may appreciate the feelings of the widow of one of the stockholders when she received an asbestos envelope addressed to her late husband with the inscription "Please Forward" beneath the address.

Too Suggestive.

A professor at Columbia said one day to a roomful of auditors:

"Chronological coherence in ideas is much to be desired, but there are times when it becomes too suggestive. For instance, I once heard a minister make the following announcement at one of his Sunday services:

"'The funeral of the late and much lamented sexton takes place on Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Thanksgiving services will be held in this chapel on Thursday morning at 11 o'clock.'"—Washington Post.

Military Economy.

A Confederate officer, serving under Jackson at second Manassas, was severely wounded in a charge. Just about that time the Confederate ammunition was running so low that the soldiers were meeting the Union charges with stones. The wounded officer lay on the field, and presently a surgeon and stretcher bearer found him. After an examination the surgeon commanded the bearers to carry the officer off to the ambulance.

"Easy, boys," he said, "the man's got three bullets in him."

The officer was just conscious enough to hear one of the bearers growl:

"Three bullets! Great Scott, don't put him in the ambulance; load him in the ammunition wagon!"—New York Post.

A ROYAL ADVENTURESS

By EDITH O. ROSS

There is an episode in French history that is a perfect story. There is no need for the author to draw upon his imagination or to supply romance. Nor did it take place so long ago either, for it occurred during the reign of Charles X., that king of France who was deposed in 1830.

His predecessor on the throne, Louis XVIII., was childless, and upon his death his younger brother, Charles, succeeded him, Charles' son, the Duke de Berry, being heir apparent. The duke married an Italian princess, who bore him a son, the Count de Chambord. The Duke de Berry was assassinated, leaving the child count heir to the throne. At the revolution of 1830 Charles abdicated in favor of his little grandson.

The Duke of Orleans succeeded in having himself proclaimed king of the French, taking the title of Louis Philippe. Charles X. and his family went to England. Charles was not a man of much force and made no effort to recover the throne for his grandson. His daughter-in-law was made of very different stuff. When she discovered that the ex-king would make no move to recover the throne of France for her son, the little Count de Chambord, she determined to take the matter into her own hands. And here begins one of the most remarkable stories of adventure enacted by royal personages.

Leaving her son in England with his grandfather, the duchess set out to stir the Legitimist party to revolution for the purpose of recovering the throne for the child. Crossing the channel, she descended through the northern part of France, and, taking a position in a province where the people were loyal to her cause, she arranged for a rising. She was advised that the time was not favorable, but would not be dissuaded. The rising took place, but was a lamentable failure. The duchess, instead of endeavoring to secure her safety, pushed on southward by land, eluding those emissaries of the government sent out to arrest her. Her adventures, dressed as a man, on the journey alone make a thrilling chapter. She succeeded in reaching the Mediterranean and from the coast of France gained her former home, Naples.

She remained some time in Italy, but was not idle. Having arranged for a rising in favor of her son in Marseilles, she went there, her landing being the signal for the revolution. Again she was doomed to disappointment. The people did not turn out in sufficient numbers to serve the purpose. The duchess was advised to leave France, but again refused.

At Grenoble she found refuge in the house of an adherent and was kept in seclusion. She was betrayed by a man who had entered her service for that very purpose. He led a party of Orleanists to the house where she was concealed, but there was some mistake in giving the signal for her arrest, and the party withdrew. Meanwhile the duchess was warned, and when they returned she and several of her adherents had betaken themselves to a small space behind a fireplace that they had planned to enter in case of necessity.

A thorough search failed to reveal their hiding place. The party of searchers finally went away, leaving a guard in the room behind the fireplace of which the duchess and her friends were concealed. Unfortunately the night was cold, and the guard built a fire on the hearth. For two nights the concealed party suffered heat and suffocation, the duchess' dress catching fire, but on the second morning, starved and burned, they gave up the struggle and surrendered.

Great was the rejoicing of the usurper king at getting the troublesome woman into his power. He shut her up in a chateau and employed a general of the army to command the guard, but more especially to watch her with a view to learning some indiscretion which would cost her the sympathy of the French people. It was not long before word was sent to Paris that the prisoner had sinned in a way that would ruin her and render her an ineffective supporter of her son's claims to the throne. It was evident to the duchess that King Louis Philippe was employing watchers who were to make sure that the evidence against her should not be turned awry. Indeed, the poor woman was treated in a most contemptible manner.

Meanwhile the king was congratulating himself that the duchess who had given him so much trouble and uneasiness was in a position from which she would be unable to escape. He redoubled those who were to watch her, or, rather, redoubled their watchfulness.

One day the cry of a child was heard in the duchess' apartment. She announced that she had been secretly married at the time she had returned to Italy to an Italian nobleman, giving his name and title. Her enemies refused to believe the statement till she produced the record of her marriage, made by a bishop of the Roman Catholic church who had performed the ceremony.

However, by having married one not of royal blood she had placed herself in a position that rendered her unable to carry on her fight for her son's claim to the throne of France. She returned to her home in Italy, where she was joined by her husband, and from that time lived the life of a private person.

A Youthful Horse Lover at the New York Show.

EXPERT DRIVER AND RIDER.

Miss Frances Ottley Is Skilled With the Reins and In the Saddle—Puzzles, Games and Other Things of Interest to Small People.

Children of the rich play a prominent part in the annual horse show held in New York. Most of the boys and girls of society are skilled drivers and equestrians and enter their drivers and saddlers in the competitions. Ponies are always an interesting feature of the show, but many of the little people are not satisfied with the smaller members of the equine world and drive and ride full sized horses. Miss Frances Ottley, daughter of Mr. J. H. Ottley, drove her fine mare Netty in one of the competitions and came out with a ribbon as a prize for her pet and her skill in handling the ribbons. She is also very much at home in the saddle, and when she adds a few years to her age she will probably be heard from as a follower of the hounds. It is a good thing for children to know horses and to love them, but most young people do not have the opportunities for this that come to the boys and girls of rich people.

Game of Elements.

A very interesting game to play is "the elements." The players sit in a circle, and the game is begun by one of them throwing a rolled up handkerchief to another and at the same time calling out the name of one of the four elements—air, water, earth or fire.

If "air" is called the player to whom the handkerchief is thrown must at once mention some creature that flies. Having done so, she throws the handkerchief to some one else, calling perhaps "earth," whereupon that player must mention an animal that inhabits the earth, and so on. The same animal must not be mentioned twice, and when "fire" is called the player to whom the handkerchief is thrown must keep silent until she throws it again. Each player after throwing the handkerchief and calling the element counts ten as the limit of time in which the answer must be given. If it is longer in coming or if something is mentioned which has been mentioned before then a forfeit follows.

Kling, Klang, Kaloosh.

This game is lots of fun, and it is better to play it in the open. One player is "it." He gives the boundary lines—for instance, one side of the street and the other side of the street. He himself stands in the middle. The other players stand over on one side, and he calls "Kling, klang, kaloosh!" The players must run over to the other side without being caught by "it."

If any one is caught he must help "it" to catch the others. The players keep on running across until all are caught, and then the first one caught is "it" for next time.

Cover Up.

Late one night, when all was still,
Creeping o'er a window sill,
Came some brownies wee—
Just exactly three.
They hopped inside and looked around,
And sleeping on a bed they found
A little boy asleep—
Asleep in slumber deep.
They jumped right in upon his bed
And pinched his feet and pinched his head.
Then to this boy they said:
"Cover up from head to toe,
For the wintry winds will blow,
Blow you out of bed.
Now, don't you kick the covers off.
If you do you'll sneeze and cough.
So snuggle down away from harm.
Beneath your blankets soft and warm."

GRACEFUL OLD AGE.

A Woman of Fifty Should Have Acquired a Few Compensations.

Being not so young as you were is not all loss. If maturity of years is an ailment then youth is another. To be fifty years old is to have made a fairly complete recovery from the ailment of youth, and that is no small achievement. It is not everybody that does it. The person who remembers statistics will tell you what proportion of us struggling mortals succumbs to youth and its mischances and hardships. It is a large proportion. The rapids of the river of life, the rockiest places, the swiftest descents, are apt to be up stream. To have passed them all and get down into the calmer levels of the fifties is a feat that justifies a good many comfortable thoughts.

Women especially who have had full measure of youthful beauty part with it usually with sighs and reluctance. Gray hair seldom pleases them; they don't like wigs; the "ravages of time" are real and sad to them, and they repair them with diligence and what skill they may command. Beauty in a woman is power. To be noticed and admired and courted for it is no doubt a very considerable stimulation and entertainment not to be indifferently parted with and not in all cases offset by gains in authority or the tribute of deference that is paid to character or the tribute of love that comes to unselfishness and gentleness and power of sympathy. What a woman loses by the years in freshness of physical beauty she ought more than to make up in wisdom that comes from living, in the fuller understanding of people and of life, in all the kinds of knowledge, in self possession and increased skill in the arrangement and discharge of the parts of speech. So it does happen with able women who have had a chance to develop and who have lived good lives. They are vastly more interesting at fifty than at twenty-two, and many of them are lovelier to look at. But beauty comes readymade, and these maturer attractions have to be earned, and not all women earn them. Harper's Magazine.

Cold Water Hardens Flesh.

The woman who has been accustomed to taking a cold shower will find it a great precaution against the cold of winter. It should be taken the first thing in the morning in a well warmed bathroom. Some enjoy the tepid shower at first, afterward allowing it to run cold.

The cold plunge is more taxing to the delicate woman, and if a shower bath is not to be had the cold sponge bath is its best substitute. All of these cold baths should be followed by a brisk rubbing with several coarse towels, so as to insure the healthy glow, which imparts a glorious tingling over the surface of the body.

If your flesh is flabby, after washing the face in warm water with a good soap, dash on the skin cold water to which has been added a teaspoonful of benzoin to a small basin of water. This will close the pores and make the skin firm and white. A cold compress around the neck at night will harden the flesh and remove the flabby appearance.

Sleeping Suits For Children.

When cool nights come the children who have graduated from sleeping bags feel the need of warm garments which will protect the feet without the need of heavy covers. Sleeping suits of a lightweight wool cost $3.75 a set, and in a heavy wool for extreme weather they cost $4.50. Both are of pure wool made as light and comfortable as possibly compatible with warmth.

Style, With Comfort and Freedom.

A rather unusual bolero is featured on this frock with box pleated skirt and pointed belt. A jacket may be used instead of the bolero however, provision being made for same in the pattern.

Clothes for juniors are characterized by the smartest of style combined with comfort and freedom. This little dress, suitable to development in serge, cloth or linen, has a separate bolero cut off in square effect above the belt of the box-pleated skirt. The bolero closes at the left side of the front and in medium size the dress requires 4¼ yards 44-inch material.

The bolero is such a smart little garment that it can be worn separately and made of any desired material. Provision also is made for a little tailored jacket to wear with the skirt. To make the bolero, however, first close underarm and shoulder seams as notched. Tuck, creasing on lines of slot perforations in front and back; stitch 1 inch from folded edge. Turn hem in right front and single small "o" perforations. Face collar and sew to neck edge, notches and center-backs even. Adjust pocket lap to position on right front, upper edge along crossline of small "o" perforations.

The skirt is attached to a waist whose underarm and shoulder seams are closed first when beginning to make. Then turn the hem in front. Face the neck and gather lower edge of front and back between double "TT" perforations; sew stay to lower edge of waist, center-fronts and center-backs even, small "o" perforation in stay at under-arm seam; large "O" perforation in stay indicates center-front.

Close sleeve seam as notched. Close seam of turn-back cuff as notched small "o" perforation and face cuff. Sew to lower edge of sleeve as notched, small "o" perforation in cuff at sleeve seam. Sew sleeve in armhole as notched, small "o" perforation at shoulder seam, easing fulness.

Next slash skirt to left center-front on double "oo" perforations and finish edges for opening. Close center-back seam. Turn hem at lower edge on double "oo" perforations. Pleat, creasing on lines of slot perforations, bring folded edges near center-front and back to the centers and bring the remaining folds to corresponding small "o" perforations; press pleats. Sew to lower edge of waist, over stay, center-fronts and center-backs even.

Line and adjust belt to position as illustrated.

This frock is pretty in rose colored cloth, with a black string tie.

Wedding Ring History.

"The first wedding ring," writes Swinburne in his "Treatise of Spousals," published in 1686, "was not of gold, but of iron, adorned with an adamant, the metal hard and durable, signifying the durance and perpetuity of the contract. Howbeit it skilleth not at this day what metal the ring be, its form being circular importeth thus much, that their mutual love and hearty affection should roundly flow from the one to the other as in a circle." And at the present day it is the ring and not its material that matters. On an emergency, owing to a forgetful bridegroom, the matrimonial contract has been sealed with the ring of a latchkey or, as in the case of the midnight marriage of the beautiful Miss Gunning to the Duke of Hamilton in 1752, with the ring of a bed curtain.

The ring has long been recognized as a symbol of marriage, but time has changed the method of wearing it. In Elizabethan days ladies wore their wedding rings on their thumbs, and we have the heroine of Southerne's "Maid's Last Prayer" exclaiming, "Marry him I must, and wear my wedding ring upon my thumb." As late as the reign of George I., according to the British Apollo, brides, though wedded by receiving the ring on the third finger, used to remove it immediately after the ceremony and wear it on the thumb.

Many Uses For Lemons.

All fruit ice creams are improved by lemon juice. Raw oysters are rendered much more palatable and also more healthful when eaten with lemon juice, as are all kinds of fish. In orange marmalade the color is made much prettier by using one-third lemon to two-thirds orange. The taste is also much improved because the lemon adds a pleasing tartness.

The lemon is also a wonderful cleanser. It will whiten wood and remove the stains of apple and potato from the hands. Lemon juice and salt will remove rust stains from linen and also ink spots. If company comes unexpectedly when the silver is not as clean as it should be lemon juice will do the work just as effectively as silver polish and with very little labor.

Hot lemonade is excellent for breaking up a cold. Lemon in hot water before meals will aid digestion and help drive out rheumatism. Lemon juice and sugar will stop a hacking cough and will relieve train or sea sickness. Lemon juice will take the stains from under the nails when peroxide fails and is very efficacious in removing tan. When the hands become wrinkled and spongy from being too long in water lemon juice will relieve the condition.

The Gas Bill.

Never heat the oven to bake one pie or pudding. That is very wasteful. It's a much better plan to have a regular baking day once or twice a week, when all the bread, cakes and pastry needed for the next few days can be cooked at once.

Gas is often wasted by being turned on too high. Any flame that comes outside the bottom of the pan is superfluous because it does not heat anything. Kettles do not boil any quicker on a burner that is turned up too far.

If the gas oven is being used for baking it doesn't cost a penny extra to heat a pan of hot water for washing up, and it does save putting a kettle on one of the top burners.

When boiling vegetables put into the saucepan a few more than you need and next day serve them as a tempting cold cooked salad.

"An Apple a Day."

FRIED BACON AND APPLES.—Place bacon on rack in dripping pan. Dripping pan should have enough water to cover bottom. Place in hot oven, cook until bacon is brown and crisp. Slice cored, unpared apples. Heat bacon drippings in pan, lay in the apples, sprinkle with sugar, cook in the oven until brown. Serve bacon on platter surrounded with apples.

Apple Shortcake.—To two cupfuls of flour are added one-half teaspoonful of salt, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one tablespoonful of sugar and one-half cupful of shortening. Mix as for baking powder biscuits. Fill pie plate with sliced apples and cover with the crust. Bake until apples are tender and crust is thoroughly baked. Turn on plate, dot with butter, sprinkle with sugar and cinnamon. Serve with or without cream.

Apple Sauce Cake.—Mix one cupful of apple sauce, unsweetened, with one cupful of sugar, one-half cupful of shortening, one teaspoonful of cinnamon, one-half teaspoonful of cloves, one-eighth of a teaspoonful of salt, one cupful of raisins, one teaspoonful of soda and two and one-half cupfuls or more of flour. Stir and bake a light brown.

Steamed Apples.—Pare and partly core apples. Do not remove the blossom end. Place apples in steamer and fill with butter, sugar and cinnamon or sugar, cinnamon and lemon or candied ginger. Serve with meringue or whipped cream.

Apple Charlotte.—Six large tart apples, one-half cupful of sugar, one-half box of gelatin, one cupful of cold water, one pint of cream.

Pare and strain the apples; then press through a colander and add sugar to them while hot. Add the gelatin, which has soaked for one-half hour in the cold water, and stir until dissolved. Stand in a pan of ice water and stir continually until the mixture begins to thicken; then fold in the cream, which has been beaten to a stiff froth. Turn into a pudding mold and serve when very cold.

In an Australian Sleeping Car.

The sleeping cars of Australia are in many ways better than those of the United States. Instead of being of continuous length they are broken up into compartments, each one of which contains two berths running crosswise the track, a separate lavatory and divers shelves, racks, hooks and cubby holes for disposing of a traveler's belongings. The privacy of the arrangement is much to my mind. The porter, who is also the conductor, takes charge of all heavy bags, satchels and packages and puts them in an apartment specially reserved for that purpose.—Bishop E. E. Hoss in Dallas News.

A Varnishing Tip.

When varnishing wood the work must be done in a warm room at a temperature of at least 75 degrees F. At a lower temperature the moisture in the air will give a milky and cloudy appearance to the varnish. On the other hand, at the higher temperature the moisture is not precipitated until the alcohol of the varnish has sufficiently evaporated to leave a thin smooth film of shellac. The durability and gloss are dependent on this.

Tall English Authors.

Inches would seem not to lack significance in literature. Of the great English writers of the Victorian era almost all were tall. Tennyson, Carlyle, Edward Fitzgerald and Matthew Arnold all reached six feet, Ruskin touched five feet ten, Froude five feet eleven, Dickens and Browning fell short of the six foot level by only a narrow space, and Thackeray turned six feet three.—London Chronicle.

Sam says:

"One day a pal o' mine handed me his package of LIBERTY Long Cut an' I loaded my old pipe and smoked up on it.

"Pretty soon I began to throw back my shoulders an' wish a grizzly bear'd come along so's I could choke him to death an' tear his hide off.

"Gee, man! You could have smelt my rubber heels scorchin' when I hot-footed it down the street that night to plank down my nickel for a package o' LIBERTY."

LIBERTY hits the spot in a grown-up man because it's made of that rare old Kentucky Long Leaf—and nothing else.

All long, clean, ripe, perfect leaves—no short, broken ones—no hard stems. It's tobacco—just tobacco.

LIBERTY is aged from three to five years to bring out the ripe, snappy flavor — the smoothness and the rich juiciness. That's why it makes such a tasty, solid, lasting chew — why it gives you a long, full-flavored, satisfying smoke.

HIGH WAGES.

Wages must be higher, then must constantly tend to increase, not because the laboring man so wills, but because of prosperity and progress of this country and of every country. It is the duty of every man that labors, as the great mass of people do—and I will include in that professional men, lawyers—it is the duty of every man that labors to desire that those who come after him in his calling shall have better profits than he had, unless he is unusually fortunate, and that means progress, and it means increased purchasing ability on the part of the masses. It is the ability to purchase by the great masses of people that you see every day on the streets in which the prosperity of the country, the prosperity of its railroads and every great industrial interest itself is absolutely involved. And any idea that wages must be progressively reduced means simple national degeneration and decay. — Judge Stephen S. Gregory.

LAW TO PREVENT BOARD'S SECRET SESSIONS

New York—Secret sessions by the Public Service Commissions will be prohibited by the Legislature if recommendation of the committee headed by Senator George F. Thompson prevails. Senator Thompson and his committee intend to find out every detail of the relations of all public service corporations with every sort of corporation, firm or individual providing financial aid or supplies.

In a letter prepared by his committee, and now ready to be sent to every public service corporation in this State, Senator Thompson has demanded that full details be sent to Perley Morse & Co., the committee's accountants, concerning all the dealings of public service corporations. The letter is exhaustive in its particularity. It rdemands among other things to know the par value of the bonds of any corporation supplying such public service corporations with anything.

ASSAILS INDIVIDUAL TEMPERANCE PLATFORM

New York—That individual temperance cannot be brought about by legislation was the belief expressed last evening before the Free Synagogue Forum, No. 36 West Sixty-eight st., by Hugh P. Fox, secretary of the United State Brewers' Association. "The futility of Prohibition" was his topic.

Mr. Fox said the enforcement of national prohibition would present the most colossal police problem that the world had ever known. He asserted a prominent government official had told a friend of his that it would require an appropriation as large as that now asked for an adequate army and navy to provide for such a police force.

UNDERTAKERS MUST REPORT DEATHS PROMPTLY

Undertakers throughout the State are being reminded by the State Board of Health in regard to a laxity in some quarters on the reporting of deaths.

The State officials have been after the physicians concerning the filing of birth certificates and with this matter cleared and appealed to the undertakers to aid in keeping the records of vital statistics up promptly.

According to the State officials the greatest complaint comes from the ciies where persons who are brought from nearby towns die at hospitals and the bodies are removed to their homes to oblige the family almost immediately and in many cases the death certificates are not filed until the following day. In this particular the law states that no body can be removed from the place of death without the filing of the death certificate and the issuance of the burial permit by the registrar. In the future fines will be imposed for violations of this statute.

LABOR'S RIGHT.

The trade union movement has always maintained that the fundamental right that must be assured to all free workingmen is the right to control their labor power, their creative ability. This power is essentially personal, inseparable from mind and inseparable from the brain and the muscles and the living body of the workers. Control over labor power means control over the individual. It is for this reason that the workers of the trade union movement refuse to delegate this control to any outside authority, even temporarily. We maintain, and rightfully maintain, that the minute this power is vested in an outside authority, that moment freedom ceases. Free workers cannot be free at one time and under the control of an outside authority at another time, or, to use the well known phrase, the workers cannot exist part free and part slave.—Samuel Gompers.

PERRY TO BE SEEN ON THE SCREEN TOMORROW

Frederick Perry, who plays the leading part in "The Family Stain," the latest William Fox big feature, is one of the most distinguished actors of the present day. He was for many years a Broadway favorite, and among the many big hits of his career was his wonderful work in "Under Cover," Mr. Perry made his debut in motion pictures with William Fox. His most notable success thus far is his work in "Dr. Rameau." Mr. Perry is one of the most conscientious and forceful workers on the screen today. Those who have followed his career are more than pleased and delighted with the manner in which he has given himself to work in the pictures. Those who have seen and enjoyed "Dr. Rameau" will be even more pleased with "The Family Stain," which also was directed by William S. Davis. Mr. Perry cames to The Quirk tomorrow

"Yes, I'm afraid it is," he answered.

Your Cows Yield as they Feel

Poor milkers are not accidents—they are usually backward because there is something wrong with their physical condition. You cannot expect such a cow to give a good milk yield until her sluggish organs have received proper medical treatment.

Kow-Kure has become the standard remedy in thousands of dairies because this famous cow medicine has great medicinal qualities that work upon and tone up the digestive and genital organs, making each perform its proper function.

You can prove for yourself the merit of Kow-Kure by trying a package on one of your poor milkers, and watch results carefully. Besides being a general tonic, Kow-Kure is especially recommended for the prevention or cure of such diseases as Abortion, Barrenness, Milk Fever, Scouring, Lost Appetite, Bunches, Retained Afterbirth, etc,

JUSTICE FOR JEWS.

American Federation Goes on Record Against Discrimination.

Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, has sent to the national workmen's committee on Jewish rights a copy of the resolutions passed by the federation at its recent convention in San Francisco, dealing with the discriminations against Jews in the various countries of the world. The resolutions read as follows:

Whereas, It has been the good fortune of the people of the United States to be comparatively free from the turmoil of European strife, its hatreds and prejudices; and

Whereas, The people and the government of the United States are in a position to exercise a beneficent influence in aiding the world to lay a foundation for a durable and permanent peace based upon justice to all; and

Whereas, In some countries of Europe the Jewish people are still deprived of elementary political and civic rights; and

Whereas, Every form of religious oppression and discrimination is contrary to the spirit of the American people; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor requests the government of the United States to urge upon the governments of the nations of other countries to cease discriminations wherever they exist and are now practiced against the Jewish people; and be it further

Resolved, That the same appeal be made by the American Federation of Labor to the organized workers of all nations.

In his accompanying letter Mr. Gompers says:

"You will be interested to know that when this resolution was reported to the convention and adopted the fraternal delegate from the British trade union congress, Ernest Bevin of the Dockers' union, told me that a resolution of practically the same character and purpose had been adopted by the British trade union congress recently held in Bristol.

"I sincerely hope that the action of the organised labor movement of America will be helpful in calling attention to the wrongs inflicted upon Jewish people and in securing for them their rights."

LAUDS LABOR MEN.

Views of a Woman Writer on the American Federation Convention.

Inez Haynes Gillmore, writer, expresses these views of the American Federation of Labor convention in a San Francisco newspaper:

"It was like listening to the plans of generals of an army.

"I was truly impressed by the physical aspect of those men. They were the biggest, the most high standing, the most straight looking men I ever saw in my life. And they had more of the fighting spirit than all of the army and navy put together, because the army and navy are bureaucratic and fight for a position, while the American Federation of Labor fights only for labor.

"I believe that the labor union is the only thing that we have that is training men to citizenship. Our schools do not do it, or colleges do not do it. But as soon as a man joins a labor union he begins his training in citizenship. The remarkable intelligence of every man in that convention as to what was going on and their knowledge and understanding of it and all of the economic laws under it was the most impressive thing I have ever seen.

"I say this without qualification, and I go on record as saying this—that the best citizens the country has will be found among the unionists."

Colorado has 22,500 workers engaged in mining, milling and smelting.

Street Railway Men's International union has a membership exceeding 100,000.

San Francisco Plasterers' union, founded in 1857, was the first formed in California.

The ten weeks' strike of the Chicago garment workers has been settled. Both sides claim victory.

Industrial accidents in Pennsylvania last year involved a wage loss to employees of over a million dollars.

Unions of California have been asked to appoint label committees to see that their members buy only union made goods and, wherever possible, goods made in California.

THE UNION LABEL.

Speaking of the value of our union stamp reminds us that local unions having funds that they want to get rid of could better spend the money for promoting union stamp and union label demand than for social affairs. A banquet or eatables and drinkables by a less formidable name are things of the moment. A picnic is over in a day, but a dollar spent wisely and efficiently in promoting the demand for the union stamp and other union labels is a missionary whose work goes on forever.—Shoe Workers' Journal.

A GOOD INVESTMENT.

Union Funds Constitute an Investment For Those Who Build Them.

The one thing which employers fear in labor organiza... power. Power is necessary to make these organizations effective. Some employers have officially indorsed labor organizations of the "proper kind." Of course, the proper kind in their estimation is the carefully expurgated editions from which all evidences of power have been carefully repressed. Such institutions would be labor organizations in name only.

Only where organizations have power do they have effectiveness in bringing betterment into the lives of their members. Power cannot exist unless there exist the sinews and munitions for sustained insistence upon demands and rights. The power of an organization is related in a very vital sense to membership and to the dues paid into the union treasury.

Those organizations which are vigorous and powerful to promote the well being of their members are invariably those organizations which have established high dues. Union funds constitute a kind of insurance for those who constitute them. Considered from a business viewpoint, there is no investment that will give so high a rate of returns as union dues.

When the resources of an organization are ample, wage movements may be undertaken with a spirit of confidence and independence that has a helpful reaction upon recalcitrant employers.

Resources facilitate the extension of organization, which in turn increases the power of the organization through increasing solidarity. Union resources put confidence into the unorganized to incur risks resulting from enlistment in the ranks of the organized. Union resources protect the workers from wage reductions and poorer conditions of work because the power of self defense constitutes a real argument against injury or provocation of contest.

A low dues paying policy is not a profitable or a wise policy for organized labor. Indeed, it would be good business sense to increase dues with every wage increase. The wage increase was due to organization, and stronger organization will in turn bring other wage increases.

As union dues are increased more benefits can be made increasingly helpful and can be extended in variety. These benefits can be managed by the organizations more cheaply and more satisfactorily than similar insurance can be furnished by state or private agencies. Assuring the unions control over these benefits removes all doubt of such assistance in industrial disputes.

Labor organizations embody an ideal, but that ideal must rest upon a practical basis if the ideal is to become reality. The practical resources to make any ideal reality depend in some degree upon the financial resources at command. The question of higher dues is one of fundamental importance to all workers. It is a matter that must not be pushed aside. It is a matter that should be given most careful and wise consideration. It is a fundamental matter, because the dues paid in a large measure determine the power which the organization exercises for the cause of human welfare.—Samuel Gompers.

THE FARMER'S CREED

I believe in a permanent agriculture, a soil that shall grow richer rather than poorer from year to year.

I believe in hundred-bushel corn and in fifty-bushel wheat, and I shall not be satisfied with anything less.

I believe that the only good weed is a dead weed, and that a clean farm is as important as a clear conscience.

I believe in the farm boy and in the farm girl, the farmer's best crops and the future's best hope.

I believe in the farm woman, and will do all in my power to make her life easier and happier.

I believe in the farmer, I believe in farm life, I believe in the inspiration of th open country.

I believe in a country school that prepares for country life, and a country church that teaches its people to love deeply and love honorably.

I believe in community spirit, in pride in home and neighbors, and I will do my part to make my own community the best in the state.

I am proud to be a farmer, and I will try earnestly to be worthy of the name.

FULTON is YOUR community; be proud of it and help it all you can and you will find out that we believe in reciprocity.

The Chamber of Commerce announces herewith that the Manager of the Farm Bureau with headquarters in Oswego, will, beginning with the month of February, come to the city of FULTON once or twice a week to meet the farmers in and around FULTON and to discuss matters with them.

Are you aware of the fact that the agriculture section around FULTON is the BEST in Oswego County?

Are you aware of the fact that all men and women should be proud to deal with the farmers around their community? Are you also aware of the fact that WITHOUT the farmers this country would not be worth very much?

* * *

With many a flaunt of green and gold,
And many a glint of yellow,
My banners beautiful unfold,
In bright September mellow;
I nod beneath the Hunter's Moon,
In camps whose fires are buried,
I waken with a million spears
In brown ranks, staunch and serried;
A whisper follows on the wind,
An echo on the river,
Come rain or drought, or sun or snow,
Let Corn be King forever—ever— — —
Hail! King Corn, forever—ever — — —
Hail! King Corn, forever!

Mother Earth may offer her choicest fields, the sun may lavish his brightest rays, the gentle showers may float down on the balmiest winds of spring to nourish the infant plant—yet, if this child of GOD has been touched by the blighting breath of decay, or is the offspring of perverted parentage, all the kindly care of loving Nature, aided by the hand of man, but emphazises the more strongly that "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

The most precious thing in this world is the labor of a human being. Yet hours are wasted every day on vacant ground and worthless stalks.

To make a good crop of corn requires GOOD LAND, GOOD SEED, GOOD CARE, and back of all these must be a GREAT MAN, a man who mixes brain with his labor.

FULTON is the very center of the BEST agricultural section for miles and miles aroundand still no one seems to see the opportunity offered here again. FULTON has more opportunities than all the other cities in this county combined.

MAYOR CRITICIZES PRACTICE OF THE "OUTS" FINANCING FOR SUCCESSORS IN OFFICE

Alderman Distin last night made application to the Board of Works to construct sewers in Hart and Phillips streets, which are located in his ward. Two property owners residing in the streets were present at the meeting with Mr. Distin and they advised the board that the cellars of their respective houses have contained three fet of water. During the discussion which took place, it developed that an appropriation of $1,200 had been cade in the budget for 1916 for sewer improvements. City Engineer Hill was asked to state how much the improvements asked for would cost and he said that the work could not be done for any less than the amount set forth in the budget, which of course, would consume the entire appropriation. Mr. Hill stated that if the sewers wereconstructed in these streets which wasb uildt originally to take care of the Phillips st. school would be complete. The Board will make an investigation and take the matter up later.

The application of J. J. McGinnis who wants to rebuild at the corner of West 1st and Hannibal sts., was received and held to await the result of the Board's inspection of the plot of ground. It is Mr. McGinnis' hope to make of the new building a modern three-story brick structure, and he desires that the city turn over to him deeds to a portion of 1st st., so that the building can be extended to the street line. City Attorney Hillick advised the Board members that it is within their rights to grant an order for the permanent or temporary discontinuance of any street or portion of a street within the city limits; that in case a permanen transfer of the land were made, there would be no way in which the property could again be restored to the city, unless by condemnation and subsequent purchase. Whether or not Mr. McGinnis would consider the acceptance of the land temporarily is not known, and for that reason the matter is laid over until later.

No bills contracted during the past year will be paid for the present is the substance of a statement made by Attorney Hillick to the Board. Before any action is taken towards meeting these debts, a thorough investigation as to their nature will be made. In the event that the bills are just, they will not be paid until there is sufficient cash in the proper fund to meet them. "I would call the attention of the board to the fact that contracts made by the Board, purchase, etc., place the responsibility of meeting payments therefore on your own shoulders, if you have contracted for these things knowing that there was no money in the city treasury to meet them with."

In discussing the matter further, Mr. Hillick stated that if a man contracts with the city to do certain improvement work and the Board of Public Works grants the same to him knowing that there wasnot sufficient money to meet payment, the city is not responsible but that the individual members of the board can be made the defendants in an action to recover the cost of the work.

It is hardly probably that any of the debts hanging over from last year will be paid from cash receipts. The matter will be taken up with the Common Council and a suggestion made that bonds be issued to cover the entire amount.

Action will now have to be taken on the payment of the pump which was installed in 1913, and for the payment of which it was first intended to issue bonds. Mr. Wiltsie gave a brief history of the transaction involving the installation of the pump, reciting the failure to carry out the plan of payment originally decided upon. It was thought that the money saved in fuel as a result of the installation of the pump could be applied on the payment of same yearly, but this plan has failed to materialize, iwth the result that arrangements will hav eto be made at this time whereby settlement of the ransaction can be made. It is likely that a bond issue will bem ade to cover this paymen, although there are strong objections to doing this from the fact that the procedure will entail a cost of three or four hundred dollars additional in the arrangements necessary for the sale of the bonds. Part payment has been made on the pump to the amount of about $3,000. A balance of $7,000 is still due.

In apportioning the lighting which is given to the city gratis, 2,000 watts was give nto the City Hall and 3,000 to the hospital.

Mayor Lewis voiced his sentiments in regard to the outgoing administration preparing the budget which the new administration is to carry out. He was outspoken in his assertions and stated that it was a mis-carriage of administrative policies for the outgoing administration to prepare an unreasonable budget which would only tend to make the incoming administration's duties more difficult and cripple their activities to a large extent.

A resolution was passed authorizing the payment of back salaries to water department employes.

Industries In Danger; Low Water Pressure to Get Attention

With the McGinnis fire in mind, which was attributed directly to inadequate water pressure at the city plugs, a group of manufacturers jointly addressed a communication to the Board of Works, calling for immediate action by the city officials to protect the interests of the city by taking such steps as are deemed advisable for existing conditions.

The letter was read to the Board last night and it was decided to call on the spokesman for the group, the man who addressed the communication and discuss the situation with him.

Fire Chief Waugh called attention to the provisions of the 1916 budget which designates a sum for the maintenance of the fire department sufficient only to pay the salaries of the men. Such items as feed for the horses, over-head charges, etc., are not provided for. Chief Waugh review ed the work of his department during the past year, and stated that the Board of Insurance Underwriters had made a promise to reduce insurance rates 16 per cent soon after the city secured its new chemical fire fighting apparatus. He has requested the underwriters to take the action they have promised

NOT A FAIR SAMPLE

Greatly daring the Detroit News ventures to descant on the dark side of the "Back to the Land" movement. Under the Caption, "The Farm Dream," our Detroit contemporary tells this doleful story, to drive home the point that rural life isn't all it's cracked up to be

"A Detroit iron molder removed his wife and children to a farm for which he traded his city residence. Unskilled in the warfare which a farmer must wage ceaselessly with soil, weather and a thousand other circumstances of nature, failure and misery came to this man. His family is broken up and his wife, as the direct results of their tribulations on a farm, has divorced him."

To that we say that the bad luck of this mechanic who tried to turn farmer, isn't a fair specimen of rural experience. The most farreaching change in this country during the past decade, is the mitigation of the hardships of the farmer and his acquisition of the comforts and luxuries of existence.

Farmers own automobiles, they have splendid harvesting machinery, they have pianos, phonographs, newspapers, pictures and books.

The telephone has wrought marvels in breaking up the dreariness of life in isolated communities.

However, the Detroit News is on firm ground when it protests against anybody without experience or capital, rushing headlong from city pursuits into amateur farming. Agriculture isn't a business for a raw hand It is a special vocation and it is getting more scientific all the while.—Buffalo Times.

GREATER USE OF SCHOOL-HOUSES

It would appear from complaints which have been received by the Superintendent of Public Instruction of California that the fashion of using school houses as community centers has spread to that state. One of these complainants made the assertion that possibly onehalf of the country schools were maintained more for dancing by the people than for the education of the children.

It is, of course, possible to carry a good thing to extremes, but it may well be doubted whether the California pessimist has fairly viewed the subject of the greater use of schoolhouses. If, as claimed, one-half of the country school houses have been so effectively used as community centers, much good for the people generally has been accomplished. The very fact that the people of a rural community can be attracted to the rural schoolhouses for wholesome entertainment, and even for dancing, will enhance the appreciation of the value of the schools. It must be remembered that evening schools, now so popular and effective in cities, are comparatively unknown in the rural communities. If the school houses were not used for these community gatherings they would be unoccupied two days in each week, and also would be dark every evening of the week.

There is a feature of these community gatherings in schoolhouses, particularly in the country districts, which seems to have been overlooked by the California complainant. The mere fact that the adults of a community meet at stated times for social purposes is ad istinct community gain not only, but leads to a higher appreciation of educational advantages. Not all the time at such gatherings is devoted to dancing and other recreation. School matters are discussed, and other matters of community interest are considered to the ultimate benefit of the pupils of the school. Besides, the mere fact that school patrons come together in the atmosphere of the schoolroom cannot have other than a wholesome psychological effect.—Rochester Chronicle and Democrat.

A TASK FOR CHEMISTS

It isn't the cost of the automobile, but the cost of gasoline that bids one pause about buying a car. The present price is 22 cents a gallon wholesale and the Standard Oil officials say it may be more yet. The large exports of gasoline to the allies, the shutting off of the importations of crude oils from Russia, Rumania and Galicia, and the increasing consumption of the fuel by multiplying automobiles limit the supply and put up the price. A large fortune awaits the chemist who discovers a satisfactory and cheaper substitute for gasoline and chemists are busy at the task. Perhaps, if the farmers were stimulated to produce alcohol as was once fondly hoped they would from the refuse of the farm, that might supply a deficiency. Chemistry can work marvels. The New York World's advices from Germany say the German chemists have found substitutes for supplies which the war has cut off from them. They have made substitutes for nitrate of potash, for rubber, for cotton and for copper. They get nitrogen from the air, rubber from potatoes, and while the rubber is not strong enough for inflated times, it makes good hard tires, so the Germans say "If we cannot drive as fast with the substitute rubber tires, we simply drive a little slower, but get American chemists, if they go to work and manufacturers are properly protected, can do anything that the Germans can. One superiority the German people have in resisting a blockade is that they can get along without what they cannot have. They are great economists.—Watertown Times

"A POOR THING"

"A poor thing but mine own," Who has not felt or said something like Shakespear's utterance about something that belonged to him? Even among dumb animals is the jealous pride of possession. When all that man and beast has is little, that little grows more precious and worth cherishing. The world may not think much of it, but the world is not invited to give its opinion.

We may lay down the law very easily to other people as to what they should do with their property; we may tell them that if they will get so much for it; we may deprecate what we consider a weak sentimentalism that stands in the way of its disposal. But that is because we do not own it. If it were ours, we would feel differently. In our minds, we even auction off other people's parcels of prejudices, bundles of wordly vanities, charms of personality. We mortgage their souls, and tell them complacently what we think they ought to do.

When it comes to a matter of personal views, if these are sincerely held, we always owe a deference and not a ridicule. Our experiences and learnings have not been the same. Wisdom begins and perishes with none of us. It was here before our coming, and it will outlast us. We should be humbled by the infinity of our ignorance.

REFORM THE STATE FINANCES

The principle and most important recommendations made in Governor Whitman's message to the Legislature of 1916 are those in which he calls for the establishment of a state budget system and the centralization of power over the funds in the treasury. Until the intelligent coordination of department expenditures is undertaken, there can be no economy. There may be saving in specific appropriations under the present practice, but this is not the result of understanding of the needs of the state; instead it arises from the immediate necessities of ap olitical party, the unpopularity of a legislator, or some other unworthy incident.

If the state expenditures were based on a careful survey of its needs and a reasonably accurate estimate of its receipts, the amounts apportioned to various public works could beb rought into harmony with a programme of steady and consistent improvement. There would be an end of starvation in one department and wasteful extravagance in another; the various public works of the state would be putf orward equitably, and the success or failure of an enterprise would be less dependent than is now the case on the accident of its sponsors. The mere preparation of a budget entails examination and adjustment that clarify the whole financial situation, and impose on its authors and the lawmakers to whom it is presented responsibilities which are unknown in the existing circumstances. Under a budget system such adventures as the Mohansic State Hospital, the abandonment of which the governor now urges, would have small chance of adoption; the errors of legislation which fastened on us the overgrown sinking fund would scarcely be committed; and useless officers would soon be cut off from the payroll.

A budget on which to build the appropriation enactments and centralized control over the moneys of the state are practicable agencies for reducing the burden of the taxpayers; their obvious disadvantage is that they reduce the possibilities of political chicane. If Governor Whitman has decided to assault this evil seriously and to urge the reforms he advocates vigorously, he will find every disinterested citizen behind him in his fight.—N. Y. Sun.

Our Washington Letter

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE

Washington—So far as Argentina is concerned the Underwood tariff law has had a fair trial, the results of which have been decidedly unfair to the American farmer, and to the revenues of the United States Treasury. Our principal importations from Argentina are wood, grains, and meats, all on the free list in the Democratic law. Had not a large portion of Argentina's production of these articles been diverted to Europe by the requirements of the countries at war, their invasion of the American market would have been even more marked, and every farmer knows that the war has kept up the price on these staples.

Secretary Redfield is exercising every art to draw our attention from unfavorable trade relations with the peace zone countries by pointing to our vast exports to the countries in the zone of war. Ignoring his efforts for a moment, let us turn our attention to our trade with Argentina, with which, next to Canada, we have the largest dealings in the western hemisphere.

The Underwood free trade law went into effect October 4, 1913. The European war commenced August 1, 1914. Hence, in order fairly to consider the effects of the Underwood law on our trade, and to rid ourselves so far as possible of the complications due to the demoralizations of war, three periods have been adopted as the standard of comparison. They are, first, the ten months, October 1912 to July 1913, under the Republican tariff law, a Republican Peace Period; second, October 1913 to July 1914, under the Democratic law, a Democratic Peace Period; third, from October 1914 to July 1915, under the Democratic law, a Democratic War Period. The figures are taken from the official reports of the Department of Commerce and are given in round numbers.

Comparin gthe Republican Peace Period with the two following we find that from October 1912 to July 1913 our imports from Argentina totalled $20,400,000, while our exports to Argentina amounted to $43,500,000, or a favorable balance of trade in our relations with that country of $23,100,000. During the Democratic Peace Period our imports from Argentina amounted to $45,600,000, an increase of 124 per cent over the previous period, while our exports to Argentina fell to $32,700,000, a decrease of 25 per cent compared with the previous period. The balance of trade turned against us during this ten months in the sum of $12,900,000; the loss of trade by displacement of American products and decreased sales to Argentina amounted to $36,000,000. Not only did Argentina contribute her share toward supplying the European belligerents, but she strengthened her hold on the American market during the Democratic War Period, October 1914 to July 1915. Our imports from Argentina during this period totalled $67,100,000, an increase of 229 per cent; our exports to her dropped to $31,000,000, a decrease of 29 per cent; her trade balance against us rose to $36,-100,000, and our loss of trade amounted to $59,200,000,—all compared with the Republican Peace Period.

What is said of Argentina applies equally to Uruguay, as to products, trade and conditions governing the same. Uruguay borders Argentina on the east. During the Republican Peace Period, October 1912 to uJly 1913, imports from Uruguay amounted to $1,-Democratic Peace Period, October 1913 to July 1914, our trade with Uruguay was, imports from $8,370,000; exports to $4,000,000. During the Democratic War Period our trade with her was, imports $9,350,000; exports $4,900,000.

Thus the showing under the Democratic tariff law, both as to imports from the exports to these two countries is unfavorable. The Underwood law has had a fair trial and the jury in 1916 will render a verdict of "guilty".

PRESIDENT ESTABLISHES JEW'S RELIEF DAY

Washington—President Wilson decided yesteday upon suggestion of Representative Sabath, of Illinois, former Representative Goldfogle of New York, and other Jewish leaders, to designate January 27 as the date for collecting funds for the relief of suffering Jews in Europe, and will issue a proclamation to that effect.

Keely's Motor.

The Keely motor was a machine invented by John W. Keely of Philadelphia, which he claimed was capable of generating its own power without cost. It was described by himself in the high sounding term as a pneumatic-pulsating-vacua engine. So successful was Keely in manipulating the machine and concealing the real agent by which it was operated that many capitalists were induced to put thousands of dollars in it. Scientific men always regarded it with extreme suspicion, and after the death of Keely in 1899 it was found to have been operated by compressed air supplied from a concealed tank

LABOR'S RIGHT.

The trade union movement has always maintained that the fundamental right that must be assured to all free workingmen is the right to control their labor power, their creative ability. This power is essentially personal, inseparable from mind and inseparable from the brain and the muscles and the living body of the workers. Control over labor power means control over the individual. It is for this reason that the workers of the trade union movement refuse to delegate this control to any outside authority, even temporarily. We maintain, and rightfully maintain, that the minute this power is vested in an outside authority, that moment freedom ceases. Free workers cannot be free at one time and under the control of an outside authority at another time, or, to use the well known phrace, the workers cannot exist part free and part slave.—Samuel Gompers.

PATIENCE.

Patience is a virtue which, if you have it not, you should strive to attain. Patience is really the capacity for and habit of enduring or suffering. It is shown by the serenity with which we submit to the annoyance caused us by others on the one hand and is displayed in a wider and deeper sense by the fortitude which one exhibits in the concerns of life, in good and bad fortune.

CONGRESS HAS MANY CIVIL WAR VETERANS

Former Soldiers of Union and Confederacy Now Fourteen.

Washington.—Scattered through the membership of the house of representatives, so far as autobiographies in the Congressional Directory disclose, are three men who served in the Union army and three men who served in the Confederate army. In the senate there are five former Union soldiers and three former Confederate soldiers.

A few years ago a much larger percentage of the house and senate members was composed of veterans of the war of '61 to '65. The latest directory furnishes the names of the old soldiers as follows:

Representatives Ebenezer J. Hill of Connecticut, Isaac R. Sherwood of Ohio and David A. Hollingsworth of Ohio, all of whom served in the Union army.

Representatives Albert Estopinal of Louisiana, J. Fred C. Talbott of Maryland and Charles M. Stedman of North Carolina of the Confederate army.

Senators John H. Bankhead of Alabama, Benjamin R. Tillman of South Carolina and Thomas B. Catron of New Mexico are the members of the senate who fought on the side of the south.

The senators who served in the northern army were John D. Works of California, Henry A. du Pont of Delaware, Knute Nelson of Minnesota, Nathan Goff of West Virginia and Francis E. Warren of Wyoming.

Senator Thomas S. Martin and Representative William A. Jones, both of Virginia, were cadets at the Virginia Military institute during the war and were called out for service in some of the Virginia campaigns.

Every congress naturally has a "kid member," and that honor in the Sixty-fourth congress has fallen to Representative Sydney E. Mudd of La Plata, Md. Mr. Mudd was born June 20, 1885, and, therefore, is thirty years old. He is the youngest member of congress. But Mr. Mudd is not the youngest man to be elected to a congress.

Representative Pat Harrison of Mississippi, a member of the present house, was only twenty-nine years old when he came to Washington in his official capacity the first time. He is now only thirty-four years old, though he is entering upon his third term.

California has more political parties represented in its delegation in congress than any other state. In the house the Pacific coast state has three members who describe themselves as Republicans.

There are three Democrats, one Independent, two Progressives, one Progressive-Republican and one Prohibitionist.

Blows Up Money.

Ashland, Ore.—Workmen employed on the ditch of the Rogue River Canal company recently set off a charge of dynamite under a stump, and the air was filled with dollars and half dollars. The blast uncovered a money cache that had been buried there since the early sixties.

BOSTON AND ITS NAME.

The City Was Originally Called Trimountain by the Pilgrims.

Boston was not always Boston. The present name of the city is of English origin, but it was originally called Trimountain, a compound Latin name, meaning three mountains. The Pilgrims landed at Plymouth rock in 1620, and when it was determined to found a town on the present site of Boston they christened it Trimountain, in recognition of three conspicuous hills that marked the site.

Of course this awkward name could not last long, and in September, 1630, it was ordered that "Trimountain shall be called Boston," after the borough of that name in Lincolnshire, England, from which several of the prominent settlers had come.

But we have not got to the root of the matter yet, for the English Boston was an abbreviation of Botolph's town, so called from the fact that St. Botolph had founded a monastery there several hundred years before the discovery of America. And so it came about that a legendary saint of the middle ages gave his name to the future literary center of New England.

The kinship of the two Bostons has been recognized on both sides, for in 1851 the mayor sent over a copy of that city's seals, framed in oak from St. Botolph's church, and they now hang in the city hall at Boston. In 1855 a number of Americans, including Charles Francis Adams and Edward Everett, joined in rebuilding part of St. Botolph's church at Boston, England, which had become dilapidated. The part of the old church thus rebuilt by Americans has a tower, called Boston tower, which forms a landmark for forty miles around.—Philadelphia Press.

How One of the Victims Came to Have Two Funerals.

In the cemetery at Goschenen in Switzerland a strange burial took place at the end of the nineteenth century. The coffin, a small one, decently and decorously consigned to earth, contained part of a human leg, a boot, some shreds of clothing and 1 franc, 50 centimes of Swiss money. The unusual ceremony was the concluding chapter of a sad history that began on the Rhone glacier eighteen years before.

In the summer of 1882 the burgomaster of Goschenen and two friends undertook the ascent of the glacier. All three lost their lives, and the bodies were found a week later frozen stiff. That of the burgomaster was stuck fast in a crevasse, and in dragging it forth the frozen right leg broke off like a snapped icicle and fell into the blue depths of the fissure. The poor mutilated body was laid away in the cemetery with every honor, for the mayor had been greatly loved and respected in his little community.

The peasants say "Seven years the glacier grows, seven years she melts," and in melting she honestly brings to the mouth of her river all that has fallen down her icy blue throat—a belief that, although partly fanciful, contains much that is true. By this strange operation of nature the leg of the mayor of Goschenen came to light after eighteen years. The boot was still on the foot; some rags of clothing clung to the leg; even the trifling sum of money in the unfortunate man's trousers pocket was honestly returned by the glacier, which keeps nothing not its own.

After eighteen years the leg was buried beside its master. The tragic pathos of its recovery robbed the occurance of all absurdity.—Exchange.

How to Converse With Authors.

I have learned, says a writer in the Atlantic Monthly, that in conversations with authors there should be long pauses. This is because every remark, after being received by the ear, must be submitted to a strict brain analysis and then given a soul bath before it is proper to venture a reply. I have found, also, that in answering too quickly I myself lose caste. I now make it a point never to respond to a question addressed to me by an author until I have counted twenty. If the author is very distinguished I make it fifty for good measure.

MISS WINIFRED HOLT.

AMERICANS AIDING FRANCE'S BLIND

Victims of War Are Being Taught Trades.

WINIFRED HOLT ACTIVE.

She Went to Paris After the Outbreak of War and Succeeded In Gathering Funds Among American Friends to Carry on Work—Keeping Away Despondency Big Task.

Paris.—Blind for life is the fate that has overtaken many of France's sons who have not been permitted to offer their lives on the altar of patriotism.

Trench warfare, the concussion of huge artillery, poisonous gases, flaming tar, have all contributed to cause wounds in the head, only too often resulting in total blindness.

American initiative again has stepped to the fore. A group of Americans have banded themselves into a committee to assist in teaching the blind. Miss Winifred Holt, well known in America for her work with the blind in the Lighthouse in New York city, was the originator of the idea.

She was in London when the war broke out as American delegate to the international congress of the blind in that city. Realizing what great opportunities the war offered to aid those who have been rendered sightless, she came to Paris and succeeded in gathering sufficient funds among American friends to carry on a limited amount of work with the soldiers.

"The darkest moments in a soldier's life are those when for the first time he realizes that he never will be able to see again," Miss Holt recently declared. "Without prompt expert assistance soon after the loss of sight the blind man is apt to become despondent, to lose his intelligence or to drift into an apathy from which it is difficult if not impossible to rouse him.

"The committee's first task is to find the blind sufferers, some of whom are marooned in improvised hospitals, farm houses or chateaux, and many of whom are congregated in the large hospitals or Red Cross stations. The committee sends visitors and teachers to these blind soldiers, and for those otherwise physically able it starts the task of 'putting eyes on their finger tips' and giving them light through work."

The ministry of war has just given a special building to be used entirely for the instruction of the blind. Many blind teachers have come forward and offered their services to Miss Holt to serve under her guidance. A class in instruction is held every morning in one of the large hotels. The men come here to start their lives over again.

Typewriters and stenographic machines especially constructed for the blind have been imported from America for their instruction. The men are taught the "touch" typewriting system, similar to that taught in many of our large business schools and colleges.

For ordinary writing and reading the international Braille raised letter system is used. The letters resemble the Morse telegraphic code in that they are a series of dots and dashes, punched through heavy parchment-like paper by a stylus. Checkerboards, playing cards, musical instruments, rattan for basket weaving, modeling clay and watches, all specially made for the blind, have been brought from America. A large consignment of games and writing materials which kind friends sent to Miss Holt to enable her to continue her work were lost on the Lusitania.

Speaking of her work with the men, Miss Holt said "My friends have been very kind in holding up my hands, and the authorities have given us every support. We are working in twenty-seven military hospitals and have a large waiting list of men who are able to be about and who wish to come to our 'school' as soon as it is opened. My staff of teachers, all of whom are necessarily French, have been most successful in their efforts."

In the Air.

She—Did you notice that an eminent professor asserted that were there an undue proportion of oxygen in the atmosphere people would become intoxicated? He—Yes; air tight, I suppose he meant.

Repartee.

On the train going out Subbubs got into conversation with a stranger, who remarked:

"I see you are putting up a good many new buildings."

"Yes," answered Subbubs, "new buildings are the only kind we put up."—Kansas City Journal.

Both Ways.

"What on earth are you doing sneaking around in the room that way, Maria, when you know I can't bear to be disturbed?"

"I was looking for an egg to make the cake icing with."

"Well, beat it!"—Baltimore American.

His Plan.

"He's one of our most successful business men."

"That so? What's his secret?"

"Well, in the first place he insists upon his clerks selling his customers what they want, not what the clerks themselves wear."—Detroit Free Press.

What men want is not talent, it is purpose; not the powers to achieve, but the will to labor.—Bulwer Lytton.

Well Disguised.

"Miss Jones isn't looking at all like herself this evening." "Oh, no; she never does."—Cleveland Leader.

A Tip.

"Poetry should be written on one side of the paper, shouldn't it?" asked the budding bard.

"That depends on the poetry," replied the editor wearily. "Lots of it shouldn't be written on either side."—New York Times.

The Dead Sea.

The daily average of 6,500,000 tons of water is received into the Dead Sea from the Jordan. There is no outlet and the level is kept down by evaporation only, which is very rapid because of the intense heat, the dry atmosphere and the dry winds.

No Longer Romantic.

"Where is that romantic old mill that I used to paint?"

"So many artists came to paint the mill," explained the owner, "that it got ashamed of its tumbledown appearance and repaired it."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Ropes of Sand.

At the seaside a girl may appear to be making ropes of sand, but they are usually strong enough to hold some fool man as long as she wants to hold him.—Florida Times-Union.

I. O. O. F. LODGE MEMBERS DINE

Largest Get-Together Function in History of No. 245---It Was for Auld Time's Sake.

It matters little whether Odd Fellowship in this city needs boosting; there can be but one effect of the banquet held last night in the Order's temple, in Oneida st., and that is, the giving of greater impetus to the growth of one of the oldest of the many fraternal societies.

The large lodge room on the temple's second story was cleared of all accountrements and in their places tables were spread, around which were at one time seated 154 men.

Mr. W. H Spanswick as toastmaster, won for himself the three lusty cheers which greeted him at the end of the program. His saluation was punctuated with the quality and quantity of wit demanded upon such occasions, and when he referred to the work of "Old 245"—past and present—the audience warmed right up to the speaker and everybody felt a glowing sense of pride at being enrolled on Neahtawanta's roster.

City Judge Wilson's response to the toast, "The Motto of Our Order" was an effort enhanced by the speaker's relation of anecdotes pertinent to his subject and in driving away dull care.

The Judge was followed by Mr. A. P. Bradt, whose flow of natural wit kept the audience in an uproar of laughter. Mr. Bradt's subject was, "The Duty of the Odd Fellow to the State," and no member of the order who heard his remarks could fail to appreciate the thought he conveyed. That a good Odd Fellow is a good citizen.

R. E. Crandall, Noble Grand of the lodge, responded to the toast, "Our Lodge." Close attention was given Mr. Crandall, whose review of the life of No. 245 was a fine commentary on the history of fraternalism in this city. Mr. Crandall informed his audience that more than 600 members have been enrolled on the lodge books and that at present there is a membership of more than one-third of the number. The lodge has paid in sick and death benefits in its history as much as $12,000.

Mr. Charles Shaffer is one of the veterans of the Neahtawanta, and he told of his appreciation of the "glad hand" he received upon his arrival in this city many years ago.

"Why is My Neighbor," by one of the "grand old men" of thel odge, was scholarly definition of a word near to persons who look for the milk of human kindness wherever it should be found.

There was a "come-back" in the person of Mr. John Painter, sr., whose subject, "How to Boom the Lodge," contained every ounce of advice necessary to build up any organization. Mr. Painter deprecated the tendency of the young men of today to seek for the glamor of other places than the lodge room—places which do not ,in the event of distress, afford help to the sufferer.

Mr. Edward P. Cole responded to the final toast, "The Advantage of Secret Societies," and he simply repeated his former successes in oratorical work. He told his attentive audience that ,in a large measure, the safety and strength of then ation's life is dependent upon the measure in which the members of fraternal societies observe their obligations.

An historical sketch, written by the toastmaster and read by him at the beginning of the festivities, produced its share om merriment, winning for the author the praise of the entire audience. Mr. Spanswick's composition follows:

Old Two-Forty-Five

In the good old town of Fulton, high on Oneida street,
In a large and stately building, there three linkers meet,
And if you attend their functions, you'll find they are alive,
And each one busy plugging for old Two-forty-five.

Our meeting night is Wednesday, the hour we start is eight,
Those who can't come early most always get here late.
But whether late or early, our brothers always strive,
To lend a hand and help the work in old Two-forty-five.

We have a few old timers, who have not gone to seed,
Stewart and Sears and Stevens, Ted Seymour and Dad Mead.
And Brooks and Woodcock, Keeler too, none are more alive,
Proud are we to have such men in old Two-forty-five.

E. P. Cole and A. M. Worden—Kelly and Cary as well,
Its mighty entertaining to hear these Brothers tell
The early history of our Lodge and schemes they did connive,
To aid the work and help the growth of old Two-forty-five.

You surely all remember John Dresser and Tone Dean
And can't forget our Brother Keyes, whom we have oft times seen.
Tom Lewis and Ed Beckwith, brought honey to our hive.
And once were jolly dead game sports in old Two-forty-five.

And, there's Frank French and Brother Fred old timers sure are they,
They manage to get here sometimes —and, hate to go away.
Merton, Fergy, Wolcott, Williams — manage to contrive,
Not to be forgotten, in old Two-forty-five.

Please don't forget Jack Painter, Walt, Boomer and Cal iDnes
In serving blowouts of this kind, that where old Painter shines.
We do not have to ask him twice, into the work he'll dive—
He knows what suits the taste of all in old Two-forty-five.

George Cuyler, Brown and Craver, and Will Merriam long ago,
Helped many a weary traveler along the road to Jerico.
To give a man his money's worth, th quartet would contrive
And no one left dissatisfied who joined Two-forty-five.

We have a certain Brother, whose name I will keep dark,
His faithful dog who guards the Inn, we often have heard bark.
And he will bark for us I know as loug as he's alive,
And tends the Mountain Inn for us in old Two-forty-five.

We can't forget old Charley Branch, Rappole, Green and Deuel
To make no mention of their names would be most awful cruel.
And, there are many others, who were later to arrive,
To keep the ball a rolling in old Two-forty-five.

The Wilsons, Birdsall, Sherman, we never will forget—
And though grim death has claimed them, in spirit they're here yet.
To Richards and Cornelius too, let loving tribute rise,
Rememb'ring them for old times sake in old Two-forty-five.

COURT FREES THE PHYSICIAN

Dr. Halsey, of Oswego, Exonerated In Jig Time by Jury In Special Term.

Oswego—A verdict for Dr. W. McD, Halsey was given by a jury in Supreme Court before Juctice Hubbs at the Court House yesterday, in an action for $10,000 damages for alleged malpractice brought against him by Carl Clifford.

The trial was very brief occupying but a half hour after the jury had been drawn. Doctor Halsey was the only witnetss sworn. He testified that he gave first aid to the plaintiff following an injury from a kick by a horse. Dr. Halsey said that he was engaged on a case in a house opposite Clifford's and was called by someone whos aid that a man was bleeding to death and needed instant attention. The Doctor responded and states that he gave first aid by stopping the flow of blood and dressing the wound. When he was to affix a bandage around the man's abdomen Dr. Halsey said that Dr. Maurice J. McGrath came into the room. He asked Dr. MacGrath if he had been called on the case and received an affirmative reply. he said that no doubt the attending physician would want to see the injury himself. He left without completing the bandage.

Justice Hubbs dismissed the allegation of malpractice, but said that he would permit the plaintiff to gi[illegible] evidence as to assault. Dr. Halsey was cross-examined and Justice Hubbs said that no evidence of assault had been given. He directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. This was done and the jury was discharged.

Dr. Halsey was surrounded by several of his colleagues who were in the court ready to testify in his behalf, and when the verdict came they congratulated him heartily.

Attorney James Taylor Lewis of New York, a recognized expert in cases involving medical practice and ethics, was attorney for Dr. Halsey. He was assisted by Harry C. Mizen of this city as counsel.

Other Cases Called

Judgment was given for the plaintiff for $300 and costs in the action of Taylor D. Boorman, an infant, by Ada E. Boorman, his guardian ad litem, vs. William M. Armour, for damages for alleged assault.

A jury was drawn in the action of Clarence [illegible] Dorsey and Otho G. Dorsey, two colored men, vs. James M. Hart. The Dorsey brothers claim, through their attorney, A. T. Jennings, that they were engaged by Mr. Hart to drill a well on his farm and that he did not pay them. Mr. Hart claims that the well was not completed.

The case of the People of the State of New York vs. Clayton F. Leroy, to recover a penalty for alleged violation of the agricultural law, will probably be tried tomorrow. T. A. Ball, attorney for the State, said today that he was ready for trial.

R. F. D. BOXES STANDARD SIZE

With a view to making the work of the rural mail carriers easier and more efficient, the postmaster general has issued an order standardizing rural and star route mail boxes.

The specifications adopted provide for boxes in two sizes, one 18½ inches long, 6¼ inches wide and 7½ inches high. The other is to be 23½ inches long, 11 inches wide and 14 inches high. The smaller of the two boxes is slightly larger than the ones now in use. The larger boxes are designed for the use of persons mailing large numbers of parcels post packages.

The new specifications for both types of bo[x] provide for coin holders to assist carriers in the collection of money left by patrons for postage. At present when the patrons of rural or star routes do not have stamps to cover letters or parcels left for collection the practice is to leave the money loose in the box. This involves waste of time and effort by the carrier, while reaching into many boxes on his route to be certain whether money has been left in there, and if so, to collect it all.

All such deposits will now be placed in the coin holder. This will be a simple device of galvanized iron and riveted to the left of the inside of the box.

All mail boxes put in service after July 1, 1916, by patrons of rural or star routes, must conform to the new specifications. Manufacturers of mail boxes who desire authorization of the use of their boxes upon rural and star routes will be required to submit for approval a sample box of each size. Them anufacture of boxes shall be deferred until the receipt of notice that the sample has been approved by the department.

The box must be well painted with a coat of aluminum bronze, covering all outside surfaces except the flag signal. The latter, which will serve to give notice whether the box contains mail for collection, must be painted on both sides with two coats of red paint. The words "U. S. Mail Approved by the Postmaster General," in well defined letters and uniformly spaced, must be embossed upon the door of each box. The box owner's name must be stenciled in black letters not less than one inch high on both sides of the boxes.

At present, though certain regulations as to the size, appearance and character of rural boxes are in effect, boxes which are uniform in design and price have not resulted. The post master general's new order on this subject will gradually affect a thorough standardization of this equipment.

K. OF C. MINSTREL SHOW TO HAVE NEW FACES

The minstrel show which the Knights of Columbus will present about Easter time will embrace local talent which has heretofore been unknown by the general public.

In soliciting the cast, which has been done by letter to the Syracuse and Oswego Councils, also by verbal request of a number of the local members, amateurs who are known for their ability to participate in musical and oratorical recitations at first reluctantly consented towards "trying out" but the committee has been very much pleased within the past days by the change in attitude shown by the persons approached.

Prof. James Lannigan, who will have entire charge of the musical en: of the show, is already taking steps towards the organization of the orchestra.

WEAKNESS CAUSE OF GOING WRONG

"More men come to prison through weakness than through wickedness, and a great many men come to prison without falling, for the simple reason that they had no place to fall from," said Dr. J. T. Gilmour, superintendent of the Ontario Reformatory, a prison farm at Guelph, Ontario, in Rochester yesterday.

Dr. Gilmour said that heredity and environment were the two causes of delinquency, and that in approaching the subject of delinquency one had to realize two basic facts, namely that a great majority of delinquents are made in their youth and that a majority are handicapped in life by mental, moral and physical defects.

"Society has no right to blame a man for not having what the Lord didn't give him," he said.

Speaking of injuring a person through misdirected kindnesses, Dr. Gilmour said:

"People with large hearts and small heads sometimes work a great deal of harm."

"I've never seen a man in whom there wasn't some bad, and I've never seen a man in whom there wasn't some good," was a statement that brought forth applause, and laughter later, when the speaker added: "Present company excepted, of course."

Must Know Men to Help Them

A few other sayings by the speaker which found favor with the audience were:

"When we love these boys as we should we will hold in our hand the key for their deliverance."

"I've never seen a bad father who didn't want his son to be a better man than he'd been himself."

"I never judge a man's failure for a success in this world till I see how his children come out."

"I do not believe it possible for a young man in his formative years to spend six months in a prison and ever be the same after."

"A cage is a cage even though it be gilded."

"If we're going to help these men we've got to live with them and learn of them."

In a discussion after the address Dr. Gilmour briefly described the prison farm. He ridiculed the "honor system" as it is described by some writers. It was not in vogue at Guelph, he said. The men are under observation day and night, although there is no gun on the place or any wall.

"There is guidance, not guns," said Dr. Gilmour, "patience, not power."

Dr. Gilmour referred to his previous assertion, that most of the men ous assertion, that most of the men were in the prison through weakness and needed guidance. If they were strong enough to remain on the farm without observation, he said, they would bes tronger than some people outside. The outdoor work, he averred, strengthened thep risoners physically.

"If you want to make a man better," he said, "you've got to begin with his stomach. There's no use in going short on grub and long on vice."

Dr. Gilmour said that 70 per cent. of the me non the farm were addicted to liquor and that 25 per cent. were hopelessly addicted. An attempt had been made, he said, to have the farm as unlike the ordinary prisons as possible and the cell effect almost had been obliterated.

"There's isn't a cell in our prison that isn't more comfortable and more convenient than a stateroom in a Pullman car," he declared.

Someone asked if there was a brass band at the farm.

"No, sir," answered the superintendent, "they don't require one when I am there."

Miss Marie Mayer, who has appeared in the "Passion Play" at Oberommergau three times, thel ast time in 1910 as Mary Magdalene, will address the club next Sunday afternoon.

FIRST CONSIDERATION

We must prepare for the advent. Let us adopt Wesley's words as our guide. Wesley said:

"Do all the good you can
By all the means you can
In all the ways you can
To all the people you can
As long as ever you can"

The welfare of nearly 12,000 persons depends upon following Wesley's advice. Whatever you do for Fulton you are doing for the greatest number of neighbors.

TOOK FRANKLIN'S ADVICE.

Then Paul Jones Named His New Ship After "Poor Richard."

In his autobiography Franklin tells how he utilized "the little spaces that occurred between the remarkable days" in his almanac to contain "proverbial sentences, chiefly such as inculcated industry and frugality as the means of procuring wealth, and thereby securing virtue, it being more difficult for a man in want to act always honestly, as, to use here one of these proverbs, 'it is hard for an empty sack to stand upright.'"

Most of these proverbs were borrowed from "the wisdom of many ages and nations," as Franklin himself acknowledges, but not a few of them seem to be due to his own witty wisdom, and that just quoted appears to be one of these. Taken as a whole, the sayings of Poor Richard range rather with the lowly proverb than with the more elevated and more incisive aphorism, and Morley chose to dismiss them with curt contempt as "kitchen maxims about thrift in time and money."

Yet the saying about the empty sack rises a little above the level of the kitchen maxim, and so does that other which declares that "If you would have your business done, go; if not, send."

One of Franklin's biographers records that when Paul Jones, after his victory in the Ranger, went to Brest to await the new ship which had been promised him, he was tormented for months by excuses and delays despite his appeals to Franklin, to the royal family and to the king himself. Then at last he chanced to pick up "Poor Richard," and the saying just quoted hit home. He took the hint, "hurried to Versailles, and there got an order for the ship which he renamed in honor of his teacher, Bon Homme Richard."—Brander Matthews in Harper's Magazine.

SOCIABLE PENGUINS.

Visits Not Appreciated by Explorers In the Antarctic.

R. E. Priestley of Captain Scott's antarctic expedition relates an amusing experience with Adelie penguins off Flagstaff point. The Terra Nova had landed a party to take off geological specimens, but the men had some difficulty in keeping the penguins away from the boat.

As we lay alongside the ice foot, says the author in his "Antarctic Adventure," we blocked the birds' access to their rookery, but that did not seem to bother the penguins in the least. They would rise out of the water a few yards off, take a glance at the boat, which they doubtless took for a stranded floe, and then disappear. From previous experience I knew what was coming and looked with interest for the next act, but the boatman who was helping me get the specimens on board was new to the vagaries of the Adelie.

I was unable to judge which was the more surprised, the sailor or the penguins, when the latter landed, half a dozen at a time, upright in the bottom of the boat. Certainly the penguins were most annoyed, and directly they found that they were trapped they assaulted the poor man with unreasoning fury, so that it was no easy matter to pitch them back into the sea.

It was on a similar occasion that an Adelie penguin, seeing what he thought was a handy piece of ice, leaped out of the water and landed on the knees of the boatswain who was in the stern. He looked the man in the face, gave one hysterical squawk of horror and shot into the sea. I have never seen a face show greater astonishment than that of our respected boatswain unless it were the penguin's.

Uniform Made a Hit.

The first Confederate uniform ever worn in a southern theater after the war was the one used by a young actor, himself the son of a Confederate soldier, for the first performance of "Held by the Enemy," by William Gillette and his company in Richmond, Va. That was in 1886. The appearance of the gray uniform, even when worn by one who had no lines to speak, was the signal for deafening applause in the audience, much to the surprise of the actors, who had grown so accustomed to it as to forget its significance.—Chicago News.

A Canary's Ears.

A canary's ears are back of and a little below its eyes. They are not hard to find when one has learned where to look. There is no outer ear, such as animals have, but simply a small opening which is covered by feathers. It is quite surprising that birds should possess the very acute hearing which they do, while lacking the fleshy flap which enables the animals to catch sounds.—St. Nicholas.

History.

"Surely," she replied, smiling sweetly. "I find that if I repeat myself persistently by sheer force of reiteration I sooner or later come to believe myself."—New York Times.

THE CITY BEAUTIFUL

HOW A SMALL CITY CAN BE BEAUTIFIED.

Frank Koester Gives Allentown Citizens Plans For Improvement.

Mr. Frank Koester, consulting engineer of New York, who has been retained by the city planning commission of Allentown, Pa., to make a report and plans for the remodeling of the city of Allentown, a fast growing city of 62,000 inhabitants, at a recent banquet at the Elks' club in Allentown gave an interesting talk on the needs of the city.

He said with proper planning the city should have 100,000 population in ten years. He showed how the transportation facilities affect trade, how the trolley moved the business more up Hamilton street. Formerly it was between Fourth and Eighth. Now most is between Fifth and Ninth. He spoke of the changes in New York from Eighth to Thirty-fourth street, how values depreciated in the old section and how that should be guarded against in Allentown by providing proper transportation facilities.

Among other points brought out by Mr. Koester were the following: All overhead wires should go underground, as the streets are too narrow to carry any obstructions.

All awnings, show cases, etc., should be removed from the pavements.

Advertising signs should be no lower than twelve feet and should show symmetry.

Window displays should be artistic.

More light should be supplied for the streets. The present lights were secured because they were cheapest, but improved lights and more are necessary to make the city more attractive.

The approaches to the city should be widened. The Bethlehem pike approach should be eighty feet wide. This can be done by condemning property, which is cheaper now than it will be in ten years from now.

He said Bethlehem was erecting a lot of houses for its workmen and urged that in order to keep ahead Allentown should build a garden city, the best place for this being on the Rittersville pike. He said in England they have comfortable three and five room houses, which rent from $42 to $52 a year and $55 to $70 respectively.

He said the city was spending $23,000 a year on temporary improvements and urged that more of this be put into permanent things. This city pays for its garbage disposal; other cities are paid for the garbage.

He urged that more parks and playgrounds were necessary in a city so closely built. In Germany the cities are large landowners. One city owns 90 per cent of the ground and builds houses for its people, and the venture is a profitable one.

STOP TREE BUTCHERY.

Protest Against the Vandalism of Telephone Companies.

Will the time ever come when the public will awaken to the fact that indefensible vandalism is practiced every day by the telephone companies, whose wires are strung along the country roads? says the Louisville Courier-Journal.

Driving along the public road one sees the tree butchers at work with ax, saw and pruning instruments, whacking off limbs which represent many years of slow growth and waxing beauty, cutting great, unsightly swathes through fine shade trees, loping the tops out of some of them, sawing off all of the limbs on one side of others, destroying shade, destroying natural ornaments willy nilly. If the trees stand inside the lines of property adjoining the road it makes no difference to the mutilators. Everything that stands in the way of the wires must go. It requires a few men a few minutes to set up a telephone pole. It requires a half century to grow a fine tree. But the half century's growth is slashed where the wires run or where the pole is to be set, and the telephone line plows on, contemptuous of the beauty it mars and of the public which allows the damage to be done.

All public highways should be flanked by shade trees. As long as telephone companies are allowed to devastate every road upon which they set their poles tree planting along the public roads will be a waste of effort. If special legislation is needed to prevent the destruction of valuable public or private property such legislation should be passed. A way can be found to put a stop to the butchery when the public awakens to realization of the dollars and cents damage, as well as the injury from an aesthetic point of view that is done.

The trees along the roads and the space along the right of way are the property of the people of the section the road traverses. Trees are treated by the telephone companies as if they owned them.

Portray Town by Movies.

Through the co-operation of merchants of the town Brainerd, Minn., will have its picture taken in the form of movies. Plans are to be made to exhibit the films in different cities throughout the state, while local real estate dealers will be asked to show them in adjoining states. It is expected a large amount of valuable publicity will result.

A PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSEUM AND GALLERY.

Reading, Pa., Has Such an Institution as Part of Educational Equipment.

A museum and art gallery as part of the equipment of a public school system is a rarity. One of the few cities credited with such an acquisition is Reading, Pa., which points with pride to its power and efficiency, writes Wallace E. Hackett in the American City.

In organizing this museum and art gallery Reading intended it to be a school museum, to be used in connection with high school work only, but it has outgrown its mission. Slowly and steadily the nucleus, obtained in 1904, was increased by such a large and valuable collection of material that the board of school directors in 1913 authorized the addition of an art department and made the exhibit a public institution.

SCHOOL CHILDREN IN THE ART GALLERY.

In 1909 the material obtained was first put into actual service. In 1914 Dr. Charles S. Foos, superintendent of schools, reported to the board of school directors that the museum and art gallery was open for inspection, and today the entire third floor and greater part of the second floor of the School Administration building are filled with the exhibit, and much more material is available.

The museum and art gallery gives twofold service to the city of Reading. It gives citizens and visitors opportunities for viewing and studying worthy efforts in art and science, and through its medium the public schools of Reading teach the children not only art and science, but geography and history as well. The traveling cases contain exhibits of interest to children of the lower grades in the study of history and geography. These are distributed among the grade schools and serve to bring the classroom into immediate touch with the usefulness of the museum and art gallery.

SANITARY INSULAR CITIES.

Dr. H. R. M. Landis of Phipps Institute Speaks on Improving Slum Conditions.

That the cities of this country could very well copy the method of sanitation now in vogue in our insular and isthmian possessions and improve the conditions in the slum sections of every large municipality was said by H. R. M. Landis of Phipps institute, who addressed the Philomusian club of Philadelphia.

Dr. Landis, who has made a study of sanitation as it affects different countries, said the same conditions could exist in this country that obtain in Australia and Germany, which are models for others to copy. With proper supervision, adequate laws and enough money to carry on the work the local governments could work wonders in cleaning up their cities.

"Manila, Panama and Porto Rico are examples of what the government of the United States could do if the officials had a free hand to remedy conditions and full power to enforce regulations," said Landis. "Any city in the United States could do the same thing if plenary power were given and the people would stand for its exercise.

"There are cities in this country that pride themselves on sanitation, but they cannot compare with those of our insular possessions."

Great Publicity Campaign.

Following the annual meeting of the Georgia chamber of commerce at Macon, plans were made for the spending of $50,000 within the next three years in exploiting the resources and industries of Georgia. It is proposed to assess each county, city and town of the state on a basis of taxable values and urge them to come to the support of the chamber in the important work that it is doing. The subscriptions are to be based upon three years, and the money is to be used in conducting a great publicity campaign for the state through motion pictures, exhibition cars and direct newspaper and magazine advertising. Among other things which the chamber proposes to do is to employ a market agent and establish a freight bureau in charge of an expert.

A Beautiful Little Frock For the Schoolgirl's Afternoon.

A PROUD COSTUME.

This little gown, so simple and graceful in its outlines, is cut in a Russian blouse effect of bottle green velvet, with dropped shoulder seams. The edges are piped with a narrow banding of the plaid taffeta which makes the skirt, a handsome plaid of navy blue and bottle green. A crush girdle and sailor collar of the plaid are the only trimming, except the vestee of white lawn fastened with tiny crochet buttons.

FOR YOUR BOYS.

Instructions How to Make Bobsleds For January.

Again snow brings opportunities for sport, and in every hilly section or in places where long, even slopes occur the old time, never stale, forever delightful art and glory of coasting will be followed and encouraged.

The various fliers, coasters, glitter jumpers, stomach bumpers (often less elegant terms are used), are all laws unto themselves, and their riders, who in various attitudes, go singly or perhaps with a passenger, lickety split down the icy grades, frequently find them uncertain steeds at the turns. Even the biggest bobsleds, when built too high and with inefficient steering apparatus, are unequal to the curves and may prove unsteady craft at all times where the passengers are erratic or the course is uneven.

As with the safest and best racing automobiles and pushmobiles, the most successful bobsled or double runner is built low and not too narrow. By the dimensions given below it will be seen that the height of the runner and the thickness of bolster and board make up the distance from the surface of the snow to the seat, and this should not be greater than ten and a half or eleven inches. The board may be any length desired up to twelve feet, this carrying an average of seven passengers sitting very close and allowing, of course, for the steersman's legs. An eight foot board is better and four or five passengers a safer and saner limit.

A bobsled may be constructed throughout, runners and all, or it may be successfully built upon two bought sleds, if they are very strongly made and braced, the material being oak, ash or elm.

The method of uniting these two sleds is not difficult. The board should be of the best material, ash, oak or elm, though hard yellow pine may serve. It should be mill planed from an inch thick or from 1¼ inches if longer than eight feet. The width is eleven or twelve inches. Make top and all corners, edges and ends round and smooth with coarse sandpaper.

Sausage a la Rheims.

To prepare this dish take half a pound of sausages, two cupfuls of mashed potatoes, seasoning, milk or gravy, two tablespoonfuls of bread crumbs. Blanch the sausages by putting them into a saucepan with cold water and bring them quickly to the boil. Then drain them, remove the skins and cut them into two or four pieces, according to size. Place these in a greased pie dish or fireproof dish and sprinkle them with pepper and salt. Then take about two cupfuls of nicely washed potatoes, seasoned and moistened with a little milk or gravy, and spread on the top of the sausages. Brush over with milk or egg, sprinkle with breadcrumbs and bake in a good oven twenty or thirty minutes.

Rice Pancakes.

Two cupfuls of boiled rice, two eggs, a cupful of milk, half a cupful of flour, a teaspoonful of baking powder. Cook as any griddlecake. Potato pancakes may be made the same, using mashed potato, seasoned with salt, pepper and butter.

An Aspirant For Criminal Honors

By LOUISE B. CUMMINGS

The city of Naples is protected from the waters of the bay on which it is built by a sea wall. At the northern end of this wall is a landing to which a few boats are fastened. One day two men lounged on this landing. One of them said to the other:

"Luigi, how is it that you always have money to spend and yet you never work, while I am usually hunting for a job and can never get one unless it is unloading the ships at the docks on the other side of the city? And, I can assure you, that is very hard work and poor pay."

A knowing look came upon Luigi's face. "Only fools work, Giovanni," he said. "Wise men plan."

"I know what you mean," said Giovanni. "What you call wisdom is arranging to take one's share of the good things of the earth of which he has been unjustly deprived. That is all very well for you, for if you get caught you are not punished, while I—well, I would suffer the penalty."

"What do you mean by that?"

"You know very well that when you are tried your friends are in court. A witness is called to testify against you. You clasp your hands together over your breast dolorously. The witness knows that if he testifies against you he will be killed. How is all this arranged?"

"Do you really wish to become one of us?"

"I surely do."

"Well, I have my eye on a rich man who should by rights divide with me, I being poor. He is looking for a butler. Go to him and solicit the place. When you see a chance for a good haul make it, divide with me, and I will see, if you are arrested and tried for maintaining your right, that you are protected."

Giovanni accepted the proposition, went to one Signor Murelli and obtained the position of butler, to Luigi's surprise, with very little difficulty. Within a month he left Murelli's service with 1,000 lire, which he divided with Luigi. Giovanni was arrested and tried, but the witnesses against him were cowed, and he was acquitted.

One day soon after that he went to his friend Luigi and said: "I have heard that the police are on the track of the murderer of Francelli, who was done to death six months ago. They have laid a trap for him, and he will very likely walk into it."

"What trap?"

"As to that, if I give information I must be paid for it. I don't save a man's life for nothing."

Luigi tried in vain to get from Giovanni the method of procedure of the police to trap the murderer, but failed. Luigi, who knew who was the murderer, went to him and told him what he had heard. It was agreed that Giovanni should be paid 500 lire for the secret. Giovanni refused to deal with any one except the person most concerned, but consented to tell things to prove that on his information depended the safety of the criminal. This frightened the latter, and, knowing that Giovanni had robbed his master and had been protected from punishment by the society of criminals, he felt it would be safe to trust him. He therefore agreed to meet him and hear what he had to say.

When the two met Giovanni demanded his pay before giving the information. Criminals do not keep their money long, and the murderer, whose name was Andrea Cavelli, could raise only a part of the sum agreed upon. Giovanni accepted it on condition that Cavelli would give his note for the rest, stipulating what the payments were for. Cavelli balked at this for awhile, but when Giovanni reminded him that he himself was a criminal and had applied through Luigi for membership in the Society For Mutual Criminal Protection he consented and signed the note filled in as Giovanni desired.

The first installment having been paid Giovanni said the police knew that Cavelli was the murderer of Francelli, but had nothing except oral testimony against him, which would be frowned down at the trial by members of the Society For Mutual Protection. The government had therefore secured the services of a woman, who was to enthrall Cavelli and secure evidence that could not be suppressed by threats. All Cavelli had to do to keep himself safe was to beware of any woman who seemed disposed to favor him. But Giovanni declared that as soon as the police had found the proper person for the decoy he would know it and would communicate it to Cavelli.

The day after this arrangement had been made a party of the carabinieri arrested Cavelli, and the officer who commanded it was Giovanni.

He had been instructed by the government to track the murderer of Francelli and for the purpose had made the acquaintance of Luigi. The position of butler had been given him by Murelli with the understanding that he was of the carabinieri and that the robbery of his master was faked. In this way he gained the confidence of the criminals and succeeded in securing the written evidence needed to convict the murderer, for the note Cavelli had given him was held to be tantamount to a confession.

Cavelli was brought to trial, and a number of his friends were in court, expecting to terrify witnesses. They had no opportunity.

Middy Blouse Costume For Ladies and Misses.

Middy blouse costume of linen or serge, the blouse to be slipped on over the head. It is trimmed with contrasting linen or silk.

More women are taking to wearing middy blouse costumes since more dignified lines are given to the blouses. This design is really chic and utterly devoid of the purely athletic effect which spoils it for any but outdoor wear.

In medium size the costume requires 5 yards 36-inch material, but the blouse alone calls for 2½ yards of material. The construction of the blouse supplies the subject for today's home dressmaking lesson.

The first step in making is to adjust the facing to position on the front, center-fronts and neck edges even; then slash down the fold at center-front, from neck edge to the large "O" perforation and finish the edges for an opening. Close shoulder seam as notched. Adjust shield underneath front, center-fronts even, bringing upper edge of shield to small "o" perforation in facing. Adjust sleeve to position, lapping armhole edge of front and back to line of small "o" perforations in sleeve, bringing single large "O" and double small "oo" perforations to corresponding perforations in sleeve; fell the edge of sleeve underneath over seam. Close underarm and sleeve seams as notched, leaving edges free below the single large "O" perforations; work eyelets along the underarm edges and lace to position. Face wrist cuff and sew to lower edge of long sleeve, seams even. Face elbow cuff, sew to short sleeve, large "O" perforation in cuff at seam of sleeve. Face collar and sew to neck edge, notches and center-backs even; roll collar as illustrated on reverse side of envelope. Turn under lower edge of blouse 1⅝ inch for a hem, and if blouse is made in shirt waist style insert elastic through hem.

Form tucks in the pocket by creasing on slot perforations and stitch. The pocket lap is now stitched to position along indicating cross-line of small "o" perforations in front. Adjust pocket to positon, upper edge of pocket along the small "o" perforations.

The collar, cuffs and flaps of the pockets may be of contrasting material, ⅝ yard being required for the purpose.

DELICIOUS PEA SOUP.—Put one and one-half pints of milk in a double boiler (a little water may be added if desired), add one can of peas mashed through a strainer and one onion cut in quarters. When ingredients have boiled about ten minutes add a pinch of saleratus, half teaspoonful of salt, a small piece of butter and one tablespoonful of flour (more if thick soup is desired) mixed smooth with cold water. Boil about ten minutes longer.

Cream of Celery Soup.—Take one head of celery, wash stalks thoroughly and chop fine. Put into granite stewpan and cover with cold water, add a lump of soda as large as a hazel nut; let boil until it is perfectly tender, perhaps twenty minutes, then add salt to taste and a quart of rich milk. Thicken slightly with one tablespoonful of flour stirred up with a little milk. Add pepper, a small piece of butter and a spoonful of whipped cream.

Pepper Pot Soup.—Three quarts of stock, one pound of boiled tripe cut in cubes, one cupful diced potatoes, one tablespoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of white pepper, one teaspoonful of sweet marjoram, one teaspoonful of chopped parsley and two tablespoonfuls of chopped onion.

Put the stock on to boil, then add the tripe and potatoes. Boil one and one-half hours. Then add the dumplings, salt, pepper, marjoram, onion and parsley. Boil fifteen minutes.

Dumplings.—Sift one-half cupful of flour, one teaspoonful of baking powder and a pinch of salt into bowl, add one-fourth cupful of milk slowly. Dust board with flour, roll out the dough and then cut into small cubes with a sharp knife. Add to the soup.

Green Split Pea Soup.—Two cupfuls of split peas, two tablespoonfuls of finely cut onions, two tablespoonfuls of butter, one tablespoonful of flour, one tablespoonful of salt, one-eighth teaspoonful of paprika, one tablespoonful of finely chopped parsley, one teaspoonful of dried thyme, one teaspoonful of dried celery leaves, one cupful of milk.

The peas are washed and put in Boston bean pot the evening before with six cupfuls of cold water. Next day (if for evening dinner) put the bean pot in oven at 12 o'clock. Do not drain. Put the onion in at once and put on the lid and forget the pot until 3 o'clock. Remove cover and add as much water to the peas as has boiled away. Stir with wooden spoon, cover and return to oven; then add all seasoning, flour and butter. Add milk last. Serve at 6:30.

LETTER IN MAILS 55 YEARS.

Son of Addressee Gets Missive of "Good Abe Lincoln's" Day.

Los Angeles, Cal.—A letter written by the Rev. Samuel Ward of Neoga, Ill., Nov. 6, 1860, the day he cast a ballot for "good Abe Lincoln," was received through the mails here recently by Professor W. B. Ward of Occidental college, a son of H. O. Ward of Zanesville, O., the man to whom it was addressed. Where the letter went after it was mailed will remain a mystery.

The next postmark after that of Neoga in 1860 is that of College Station, N. Y., Aug. 23, 1910. The letter reached Zanesville last October and after a search had been made for the addressee was forwarded here to Professor Ward, who lacks three days of being as old as the letter.

FREAK APPLE TREE.

Blossoms Half and Half at Its Sweet Will In Orchard Near Marion, Va.

Marion, Va.—This seems to be a season of freakish manifestations in garden and apple orchards of southwest Virginia. One of the most peculiar of these manifestations occurred on a farm a short distance east of Marion.

An apple tree which heretofore had borne its fruit in the natural and accepted manner blossomed in the spring on one half of the tree only, not a bloom appearing on the opposite half. Late in the summer, after the first crop of fruit had matured and been harvested, the tree blossomed on the second half, the fruit maturing in the usual manner.

HIDE ON THE DOOR.

Ends Modern Tale of Wolf That Was Too Greedy.

Minneapolis.—The fable of the greedy wolf that went once too often to the farmer's pasture became a reality here when one of the beasts evaded armed guards in Richfield and Bloomington and came to the city for his third helping of young duck at the home of Carl Hebner.

Mr. Wolf's hide is now curing on Hebner's chicken house door, while his pelt and claws are ready to be taken to the county auditor for a bounty.

Woman's World

A Beautiful Bas-relief of a Suffrage Pioneer.

SUSAN B. ANTHONY.

The historical department of the Smithsonian institution at Washington has just accepted and placed on view a bronze bas-relief of the late Susan B. Anthony by Michael Jacobs, a painter and sculptor of note residing in that city.

The bas-relief, which is in the "modern style," being of the school of Rodin, is a noteworthy example of the present tendency in sculpture, which is to keep the relief as low as possible. The relief on the medallion of Miss Anthony is only one-fourth of an inch high. The picture is that of a thoughtful idealist, with just a suggestion of the unconquerable fire which shone out through the bold personality of the great suffrage leader.

As a compliment to the National American Woman Suffrage association, of which Miss Anthony was president from 1892 until her death in 1906, Mr. Jacobs has had cast a second copy of the bas-relief, which was formally presented to the national association during its forty-seventh annual convention in Washington Dec. 14 to 19.

Mr. Jacobs is well known as a portrait painter, having executed many commissions for titled Europeans during his stay abroad.

Rubber Plant's Winter Cure.

Rubber plants need a sun bath every day. Their feet should be kept damp, but not wet. The leaves should be washed twice a week in good soapsuds and rinsed in clear water.

When the pot gets too full of roots repot the plant. Also give it a dose of diluted ammonia occasionally.

With regard to the housewife's potted plants generally, Uncle Sam says she should chase the woolly white mealy bugs and the little red ants away from them with a toothpick. She may drown the red spider with a squirt gun. If the bugs and spiders shatter your preparedness program you are advised to cut the plants off within an inch of their lives and throw the cuttings away. The plants will grow again.

The green fly, which is not so green as it looks, won't bother your plants if you keep them well bathed and fed.

For Dry Cleaning.

In cleaning any fabric with gasoline or similar fluid it sometimes happens that a ring is left around the garment in process of cleansing. To prevent such a ring it is recommended that by adding common table salt to the gasoline used spots can often be removed from delicate fabrics in a most satisfactory manner.

If, however, a ring has been left the place cleansed should be wet again and immediately covered while still damp with fuller's earth, extending just beyond the ring. Let this remain on for some time, and when brushed off the spot should have disappeared. Gypsum may be used in like manner instead of the fuller's earth if preferred.

British Rush Force to Relieve Situation on Tigris; Defeated

London—The withdrawal of the remainder of the allied forces from the Gallipoli Peninsula has transferred the scene of British anxiety to Mesopotamia, where the army under the supreme command of General Nixon apparently is in grave danger at Kut-el-Amara. Mr. J. Austen Chamberlain, Secretary for India, sought to allay the rumors that have been spreading through London the last few days by an announcement in the House of Commons of a Turkish defeat south of Kut-el-Amara and the capture of 700 men. But in the same address he announced the retirement of General Nixon from command of the army and the appointment of Sir Percy Lake as his successor. General Nixon's retirement was explained on the ground of his ill health.

In telling the House of Commons the news of the British success on the Tigris, Mr. Chamberlain said:

"General Alymer left Miam, Alligarbi, on January 6 with troops marching to the relief of Kut-el-Amara. On the same day General Townsend, at Kut, in immediate command of the army, reported that the previous night the enemy had opened a heavy fire on the northwest front and on the village opposite Kut, but had made no attack. On the night of January 7 General Alymer reported heavy firing on the south bank of the Tigris.

"On the right bank General Campbell's column carried the enemy's position, taking two guns and 700 prisoners, and then entrenched. Meanwhile the main attack on the left bank was retarded by an enemy outflanking movement, and General Alymer reported that he apparently was opposed by three Turkish divisions.

"On the evening of January 8 he reported that owing to fatigue, the troops had been unable tom ake any progress that day. On the 9th he reported the enemy in retreat and that he was pursuing, but that heavy rains hindered the pursuit.

"From later telegrams it appears that the enemy has reached Khora."

Miam Alligarbi, the point from whrich the relief column was marching to Kut-el-Amara, is about fifty miles from the latter town and on the right bank of the Tigris. Troops had been sent up the river from the Persian Gulf aboard river transports, but, in the view of militory observers, the presence of hostile forces above Miam caused the disembarkation.

As further commentary on the position at Kut, two messages from German sources received here yesterday, were passed without comment by thec ensor. The first, by wireless from Berlin, said:—

"It is hoped the fort will soon either be taken or will fall for want of foodstuffs, and that the British defenders, who number more than ten thousand, will be captured.

"The British thought by leaving these forces in Kut-el-Amara to guarantee the defense of the town and also to assure the orderly retreat of the remainder of the army. This portion of the army is at present a long way southeast of Kut-el-Amara and cannot go to the help of the fort, especially as the morale of this force is shaken."

The second, a semi-official statement received in Amsterdam from Constantinople, and forwarded here, follows:

"On the Irak front the enemy, whose strength is estimated at one division, which was stationed at Miam Alligarbi in order to come to ther escue at Kut-el-Amara, on January 6 and 7, under the protection of four gunboats, attacked our positions at Sheik Said, but was repulsed by our counter attack. "We made some prisoners. The enemy losses are estimated at three thousand. The enemy cavalry, suffered especially severe losss."

A DEMOCRAT ATTACKS PRESIDENT'S COURSE

Washington—Senator Newlands, of Nevada, Democrat, attacked his party's record in the Senate today, delivering a long prepared speech in which he criticized the tariff and banking reforms—the chief legislative achievements of the Wilson administration. He declared that because there had been industrial and commercial depression with Democratic control of legislation, the party would be in danger of defeat at the next presidential election unless the European war continued and made the Presiden's "sagacious and firm" handling of foreign affairs the overshadowing issue.

POPE BENEDICT XV. IS HARD WORKER

Rises at 6 and Is Frequently Engaged Up to Midnight.

TAKES HIS MEALS ALONE.

After Midday Refection the Pontiff Walks In Vatican Gardens if It Is Not Too Hot—Often Goes to the End, Where He Watches Traffic and People With Interest.

Rome.—Benedict XV. is one of the most energetic pontiffs who ever sat upon St. Peter's throne. He gets through more work in the day than most busy men in the outer world. He rises at 6 o'clock, summer and winter. As soon as he is dressed he says mass in his private chapel, assisted by one of his chaplains. After that is a frugal breakfast, consisting of an egg beaten up in a cup of milk—nothing else. Before 8 he is hard at work.

His first task is to read the daily papers. Though his secretaries always prepare for him what they consider the most interesting pieces of news, he prefers to read it first hand. The

POPE BENEDICT XV.

Catholic papers are soon done with. He spends far more time with the Italian Liberal and Democratic organs.

At 9 o'clock the mail is brought in. Secretaries segregate it rapidly, submit the more important letters to the pope, and these occupy him till about 10 o'clock, when he receives the cardinal secretary of state.

At 10:30 the private and public audiences begin. Here Pope Benedict shows a marked difference from his predecessor. Pope Pius X. used to like to talk with everybody who came; none went away without a special word from him. But Benedict does not spend so much time on his visitors. Those whom mere curiosity has brought are soon dismissed. It is only in the case of an important person that he lingers in conversation. But even then the audiences last till midday, when the pope takes the principal meal of the day.

Pius X. always dined with one of his chaplains. When the present pope was elected there was much speculation as to whether he would follow that custom. But the order came from his major domo before the first meal that Cardinal Della Chiesa ate as pope to set his table for one person, and he always adheres to the rule of taking his meals alone. His midday meal—lunch or dinner, whichever you like to call it—consists of an Italian soup with plenty of macaroni and cheese, a course of meat, a couple of vegetables and fruit, with a glass of French wine—no more.

After this comes recreation. Until 2:30 or 3 he walks in his private apartments or, when the weather is not too hot, in the Vatican gardens. He goes on foot, unattended by guards or chamberlains, and walks briskly. He often goes to the end of the gardens, to the wall that looks on the Piazza del Resorgimento, Rome's most modern neighborhood, and people down below in the palaces nearest the pontifical gardens can see the pope watching the traffic with evident interest.

At 3 p. m. he goes back to work. Reports, instructions to his nuncios and various correspondence are now attended to. This goes on until 6, when more audiences are held. But these are of a private or intimate nature and are never reported in the Osservatore Romano, the Vatican organ.

It is at this hour that Benedict XV. receives his cardinals, the higher officials at the papal court and, very often, Italians who have some political or diplomatic position in the secular government and who cannot therefore go to the Vatican officially. At these evening audiences the pope learns more of what goes on in public affairs outside his domain than at any other time. It is in many respects the most important part of his day.

At 8 the audiences are closed. The pope then takes a supper of eggs beaten up in milk and talks to chosen members of the household for half an hour. And then to work again. Very often the three windows of the pontifical study are lighted up as as late as midnight.

No village priest works harder than Benedict XV.

A CHANGE OF LUCK

Story of a Man Who Yearned to Own an Automobile.

HIS CHANCE CAME AT LAST.

It Was Wholly Unexpected and Under Peculiar Circumstances, but the Car, a Beauty, Was His Very Own—Then Came the Saddening Climax.

The fierce joy a poor man feels when he has at last gained possession of an auto he has craved is sometimes a delusion and a snare. I know, for I have experienced said joy.

Anything is likely to happen to a United States marine on his travels around and about this old earth of ours, and it so fell out at the Frisco fire that I became sole owner of a $6,000 touring car for exactly thirty-seven minutes. Rudolph Spreckels, the millionaire sugar refiner, gave it to me, and I don't remember whether I thanked him for it or not. I hope not.

I was on duty at the United States marine barracks on Mare island at the time of the earthquake and fire at San Francisco, and when we got word of the affair we marines made a record breaking dash in a torpedo boat destroyer to the scene of the disaster.

Near the corner of Van Ness avenue and Bush street, at the foot of Lafayette square, stood the million dollar home of Rudolph Spreckels. Some of the marines entered in the course of duty, while I went to the rear and into the garage. There in the garage, flat on his back under the prettiest car you ever laid eyes on, was Rudolph Spreckels, vainly endeavoring to unlock the rear wheel gearing of the machine. Something had locked the rear wheels and had put the car out of commission.

I tried as best I could to assist Mr. Spreckels, but I wasn't of much use considering I'm no mechanician. Then he and I together tried to shove the car through the door of the garage, but halfway through it stuck, and Mr. Spreckels became somewhat discouraged. The fire was nearing his home rapidly, and, as there was no time to lose, he clasped my hand fervently and said, "The car is yours, my boy, if you can save it." Then he made off for the heights of Lafayette square and safety.

For a moment I stood transfixed with the wonder of it all, for I could scarcely realize that the beautiful car was all my own, to do with as I pleased. And then I came out of my dream and gazed at the crippled car stuck fast in the doorway.

Down the street maddened people were hurrying to Lafayette square, dragging their belongings with them, but their shrill cries of terror and apprehension found scarce an answering echo in my heart. I had troubles of my own just then. Six thousand dollars of my money was tied up in that door, and to save it I realized that I must act quickly. It would take at least twenty men to shove that car to the heights of Lafayette square and safety, and I knew that I could look for no assistance from the half crazed people who were scurrying to that vantage point. My marine companions had gone farther down the street on their errands of merciful duty, and I could not look to them for help. But I could not save the car by gazing around helplessly, and I mapped out a plan of action.

I was wearing a big 38 at my side, and I must have been a wonderful figure to the onlookers as, with brandished pistol, I joined the mob on the street, shouting wildly as I ran, "A horse, a horse—me kingdom for a horse!"

My purpose was to impress into my service any automobile or horse I might find and so drag my beauty "six" to Lafayette square. But there was nothing doing. I rushed wildly up and down the street, but the maddened throng paid not the slightest heed to me. Nor could a single horse or auto be seen anywhere. The fire had almost reached Bush and Van Ness streets, and I knew that I had but one chance. Perhaps in Lafayette square was some person who had brought his valuables there by aid of horse or auto power and I might be able to borrow the means of propulsion for a few minutes. Borrow? Heavens! With that six shooter in my starboard mitt, borrow was a mighty poor word. The automobile and fire mania was on me, and I was not responsible.

So, Mercury heeled, I ascended to Lafayette square. Arrived there, I looked down upon the tragic scene below. The fire had reached Van Ness avenue, and as I looked the tiled roofing of the Spreckels home fell in, giving vent to forked flames that shot in and out like serpents' tongues. A few minutes later the tiling on the Spreckels garage gave way, and my beauty "six" lay crushed and buried in the mass of wreckage.

I could look no longer. Heartsick and weary, I wended my way through the crowd gathered in Lafayette square. Then I started down the hill in quest of my comrades.

No, indeed, you never realize what life really means until you have watched the only automobile you ever owned burn up exactly thirty-seven minutes after you began to own it.—Sergeant Raymond Britt, United States Marine Corps.

DECLARES ENGLAND MUST DOMINATE WORLD'S TRADE

London—Walter Runciman, president of the Board of Trade, won tremendous applause from the House of Commons tonight by a speech in which he declared that the Entente Allies must take steps to see that Germany is unable to carry on a trade war against them after peace is signed.

"There are signs," he said "that at last Germany is beginning to feel the economic pressure of our blockade. Her food supplies are becoming depleted, while ours are increasing.

"Although our exports have fallen oud our imports risen, there is no doubt that the economic strength of Great Britain is so well founded that we can stand the strain far better than the Central Powers.

"Bread rios in Berlin and in nearly every other big German city do not occur without good reasons. We have deprived the enemy of many necessities of warfare and possibly some of the necessities of life. Her stock of raw materials are giving out.

"Economic pressure, possible better than any other means, will ultimately persuade Germany of the fruitlessness of continuing the struggle.

"We can stand the strain longer than Germany, and if we husband our resources the disaster that will fall upon her will be almost irreparable. We must make it clear, however, that when peace comes we will not permit the outbreak of the economic war which Germany would warge agains ourselves and our allies.

Discussing the suggestion of free trade within the British Empire, Mr. Runciman remarked that the Dominions of Great Britain were not likely to alter their methods or their attitude toward the mother country. The Colonies were determined to rais their revenue and to fosten their industries in their own way, and he was afraid the idea of free trade within the empire must be dismissed.

"I feel the same way regarding the proposed Zoluverein to include all the allies, but if such an arrangement prove essential to end the war successfully, we shall have it, for there is no arrangement that the allies are not prepared to make to that end."

He declared that the British Empire would recuperate after the war faster than any other country. "Then it will be our duty," he added, "to aid as far as we can France, Russia, Italy and our other allies."

BANKS MAY BOW BEFORE NEW LAW

New York—Resignations of many prominent bankers from directorates of leading national banks all over the country are expected in the annual bank elections today. The changes will be made to anticipate the prihibition against interlocking directorates contained in the Clayton law. The law went into effect October 15, 1914, but to allow the banks more time to readjust the personnel of their management two years were allowed for the elimination of directors serving more than one bank.

In many cases the readjustments made necessary will not take place for some months, although today's meeting are the last regular stockholders' sessions before the requirements of the Clayton law must be met.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

When the last session of congress adjourned there were three so-called agricultural bills pending. In other words, they died with the passing of that session of congress and will have to be re-introduced at this session if they are revived. These were known as the warehouse bill, the grain grades bill and the rural credits bill. All three of them are of great importance to the agricultural interests of this country, and it is reasonable to believe they will be urged at the present sesion of congress.

The warehouse bill grew out of the war. It was introduced by Senator Smith of Georgia primiarily to aid cotton growers, but it was at once amended to affect other farming interests. The bill proposed that the government license warehouses and that these licensed warehouses should issue receipts for cotton or grain or other imperishable farm products. Bearing the stamp of the government, the warehouse receipts would naturally have standing with banks and commercial institutions generally, just as warehouse receipts for spirits now held in bond by the government, have a banking value.

If the bill passes and becames a law, a farmer with, say, a thousand bushels of wheat, could take it to a government-licensed warehouse, and the person in charge would issue "receipts"—paper showing that a thousand bushels of wheat had been deposited in the warehouse. This wheat would be subject to withdrawal at any time the receipt was presented, and by whomsoever presented the receipt.

The farmer could then go to the bank and borrow money upon the receipt, of course, the bank using its own discretion as to the amount loaned. If the bank saw fit to loan, say, seventy-five cents a bushel on the grain, the farmer could borrow that amount, and still retain title to the wheat. If wheat advanced to a point where he desired to close out entirely, he could sell the grain, subject to the seventy-five cents a bushel borrowed already on it. In that way a farmer would not be forced to sell his grain simply because he needed a little money. He could get the money upon the warehouse receipt.

The grain grades bill provides for governmental inspection or grading of grain in accordance with a federal standard. (This is done in Canada). At this time various states have established standard grades, but they vary in the different states, of course. The federal regulation would make the grading of grain uniform throughout the country.

The farm credits bill has been under consideration in this country for a long time, but nothing definite has as yet been worked out. Many of the European countries (The Netherlands setting the example) have such measures, intended to enable farmers to secure money for improvements and for harvesting and marketing their crops, at a low rate of interest. There are several plans under consideration, but no one plan has been agreed upon. Committees of investigation have visited many Eropean countries to study the methods used over there, and these reports are all valuable. But there are so many interests opposed to the lowering of rates of interest to farmers exclusively that any proposition advanced is likely to have rough sledding. However, the president is insistent that congress come to the relief of the agricultural communities, and it is possible that before congress adjourns we shall have some kind of a farm credit measure.

Austrians Capture Key to Adriatic in Steam Roller Attack

London—All the newspapers this morning accept and give great prominence to the Vienna report that the Austrians have captured Mount Loveen, the Gibralter of the Adriatic, the Daily Chronicle asserting its possession by Austria alters the equilibrium of the Adriatic to the serious disadvantage of the Entente.

This significant success of the Austrians is offset, however, the Chronicle says, by the utter defeat of 60,000 Germans after eight attacks in the Champagne district and by the forward move of the Russian Colossus, which is winning decisive victories along the Styr in frightful cold and amid furious snowstorms, adding that on both fronts the Germans have suffered appalling losses.

From three sides the little mountain kingdom of Montenegro is feeling the force of Austrian wrath, backed by the determination of the Ball Platz to win the control of the Adriatic littoral and thus at the stroke guard the flank of Trieste and defeat the larger Italian aspirations in the Balkans.

Suffering intensely from hunger, inadequate supplies of guns and ammunition and overwhelmingly outnumbered, the sturdy, hard fighting army faces thef ate of its Serbian brothers. Austrians yesterday, in a continuation of their steam roller attack, captured the stronghold of Mount Loveen, six and a half miles from Cettinje, the capital; drove the Montenegrins across the River Lim and occupied Berane.

The compaign against Montenegro was permitted to lapse for sometime after the obliteration of the Serbs as a fighting force, but ten days ago activity was resumed and since then the operations have been prosecutew with remarkable vigor, supported in the Adriatic byl arge naval forces. While greatly reinforced columns began an attack along the eastern frontier from Ipek northward the western frontier was attacked from the naval base of Cattaro. This effort was directed principally against Loveen, which, held by the Montenegrins, dominated Cattaro. The mountain is 3,770 feet high and had been heavily fortified. The Austrians began their assaults on the height last Thursday by concentrating on it a tremendous fire from the Cattaro forts and war ships lying in the gulf. Periodical bombardments, followed by infantry charges, carried the Austrians through the first line defences on Sunday. Yesterday the last position was carried and Cettinje was placed at the mercy of the Austro-Hungarian forces.

The loss of Loveen wil cause great disappointment to Italy because it will completely reverse the balance of power in the Adriatic. The The possession of Loveen will be invaluable to the Central Powers. Austria wil be able to create a first class naval base in the Bocche di Cattaro, which forms a fine natural harbor, protected by the guns of Mount Loveen. The Austrians would thus command the whole of the Adriatic.

REDMOND WITHDRAWS OPPOSITION TO COMPULSION

London—Political interest in Great Britain yesterday was divided between the debate on the second reading in the Commons of the Government's compulsion bill, when Mr. John Redmond came out strongly for the measure, and the remarkable speech on Monday by Mr. Walter Runciman, president of the Board of Ttrade. Mr. Runciman's sentiments were warmly applauded yesterday, especially when he said:—

"England is looking ahead, not backward. We will not allow Germany after the war to become a serious commercial rival. All business will be done with the Allied Powers and neutral nations, as Germany will not be allowed to lift her head commercially. Never again will German liners be permitted to use English ports without paying prohibitive taxes. Never will they be permitted to lie in Southampton Water to evade port duties. Never will German syndicates be allowed to exploit English markets. The Allies joined in war will support one another in peace. Germany commercially is completely beaten."

Mr. John E. Redmond, Parliamentary leader of the Irish party, announced in the House of oCmmons that the nationalists would not further oppose them ilitary service bill.

Mr. Redmond intervened early in the debate, having gone direct to Parliament from am eeting of the Irish party. He quickly ranged himself and his followers once more on the side of the government.

Mr. Redmond said that the Irish nationalists, having made their protest against the military service bill, and recognizing that the measure had the support of an overwhelming majority of British representatives in the House, would cast no further vote in any form against it. Even the opponents of the bill, he said, admitted it was receiving the support of a large majority of thep ublic of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Redmond added that the majority in favor of theb ill in the vote on first reading, excluding the Irish members, was 10 to 1, and that inthese circumstances he and his colleagues could not take the responsibility of any further opposition. He said the bill would become law, and he hoped it would be passed rapidly.

Taxi Owners Would Keep Out Transient Competition; High Fee

Proprietors of taxicabs and autos used for the carriage of passengers may have to pay a higher licence fee than $2, provided the Common Council adopts a resolution presented at last night's long session of the Board. The new resolution affecting taxis calls for and annual fee of $50, the purpose of which is to protect taxicab owners who maintain their service permanently. During special occasions, such as the County Fair week, automobile owners come from nearby towns to participate in the earnings. It is believed the $50 fee will discourage the transient drivers of cars. The resolution will be discussed by the Ordinance Committee at a special meeting to be held on Tuesday. Alderman Baker, Malone and Van Valkenburg comprise this committee, and the gentlemen will seek the opinions of taxicab owners in the meantime.

George M. Fanning appeared before the board in behalf of George Johnston, requesting that assessments on personal property belonging to Mr. Johnston, for the years 1913, 1914, 1915, be cancelled. Mr. Johnston was declared bankrupt during this period and his stock was purchased by a local hardware concern. The Board decided unanimously to cancel the 1915 assessment as it was stated the stock was not in Mr. Johnston's possession during that year, but the 1913-14 assessments will be left intact and an effort made to collect thereon.

Mr. Fanning also spoke in behalf of the Police Pension fund, which it is desired to install for the benefit of retired policemen, disabled members of the force, etc. A considerable amount of money was realized on the recent patrolman's ball, which sum will form a nucleus for the fund, and a request will be made that 10 per cent. of the excise receipts be contributed yearly to the pension fund. A state law stipulates that not more than this percentage can be drawn from the excise fund for the said purpose. Mr. Fanning asked that the board take immediate action on the matter and have it submitted to the present legislature.

The City Chamberlain reported to the Board that taxes on certain improvement bonds expired on aJnuary 1, 15th, and February 1st, 1916. A resolution was adopted authorizing the payment of the interest items. The same resolution provides for the payment of $375 to the Library, the last quarterly installment due.

A resolution was introduced authorizing the payment of fees to physicians who have submitted reports on births and deaths, as required by law, from April 26th, 1915, to December 31st, 1915. The physicians and the amounts to be paid and their reports are as follows:

H. J. Terpening, $6.50; births, 2; deaths, 24. H. W Schlappi, 10.00; births 30; deaths 10. H. M. Doane, $3.25. Agatha Wuychuch, $3.00; births, 12. S. D. Kellar, $5.25. E. A. Gladman, $9.25; births, 27, deaths, 10. E. J. Cusack, $12.00; births, 32; deaths, 16. G. G. Whitaker, $3.75. L. F. Joy, $9.75; births, 28; deaths, 11. C. L. Fessenden, $2.25; births, 7; deaths, 2. N. ## TURKS MASSED TO HALT BRITISH RELIEF FORCE

London—The next big battle between the British and Turks in Mesopotamia is expected to take place six miles to the eastward of Kut-el-Amara, at a spot where the British met and routed the Turkish forces on their first advance up the Tigris toward Bagdad.

Cavalry scouts from the relief force of General Aylmer, who is fighting to join the 10,000 British troops under General Townshend, besieged at Kut-el-Amara, have located a large Turkish force at that point, and as soon as the British advance is resumed from Sheik Saad the real battle to open the road to Kut-el?Amara will begin.

The Turkish army between Kut-el-Amara and Sheik Saad is reported to outnumber greatly the British relief force and London realizes it will be only by the most desperate fighting that General Aylmer will be able to cut his way through to a juncture with General Townshend's little command at Kut-el-Amara, twenty miles away.

Because of the bad weather conditions and then ecessity of sending the wounded down the Tigris the British at Sheik Saad made no attempt yesterday to advance, according to an announcement made in the House of Commons by Mr. J. Austin Chamberlain, Secretary for India.

The fresh air cars didn't prove to be so attractive in practice as they appeared in theory, which was worked out in a stuffy atmosphere. A sleigh ride has a wonderful attraction to one looking out through the windows of a cozy room, but it is a different matter when the discontented and yearning soul gets on the front seat and speeds against a biting wintry blast. The open car in winter provides all of the sleigh ride sensations except the esthetic ones, and even more to boot. The chilled rider cannot alight and warm up until the journey's end. One thing, however, the "fresh air fiend" may do without interfering with the comfort of his fellows, and that is fill up on fresh air "before and after" his shut-in ride.

Under the constitution adopted about three years ago in China there was a pretense of provisions for future elections, but they were so fashioned that the president could re-elect himself indefinitely and at his death leave the machinery in the hands of his friends. The only practical change is the dropping of the pretense of elections and the making of the rule hereditary.

If this country is to look out for the South American states it might be well to give them a hint about preparedness on their own hook. True philanthropy helps only those who are unable to help themselves.

THE EMBRYO CITIZENS

"Courtrooms are crowded with boy and girl offenders because the public schools have failed in their duty. We must break up our antiquated school system to save children," declared an eastern educator recently before the National Education Association in session in St. Paul, Minn. This is an interesting admission from the public school system itself, going to indicate the realization on the part of an ever increasing number of public educators of the need for changes in the schoolrooms to better fit children—both boys and girls—for good citizenship.

The schools, admit educators, must give civic education. They must train boys—and girls, as well—to become good citizens. They must teach the duties, responsibilities and opportunities of citizenship. This cannot be done by solely academic courses, nor is it possible in full measure by vocational instruction or by continuation schools. It cannot be accomplished even by moral education, although that will fill one part of the bill. There is no other way than by actual courses in civic education.

The school system is coming to realize its relation to society and to the community. It is ready to assume this duty if the public provides the interest necessary. Children have always secured a large share of their fitness or unfitness for life in the schools. If unfitness has been the outcome even in a few cases, it is time to break up the old system and as the educator says, "save children."

Cities here and there are beginning to take up civic education and adapt it to local conditions to train children in a non-partisan manner for useful, responsible and intelligent transaction and practice of citizenship. But a more general application of the subject in the public school curriculum is essential if children are to be saved. When the children are saved, it will not be necessary to worry about the cities, the towns, the counties, states and nations.

POLITICS AND THE STATE SERVICE

Various reasons why the state payroll is overloaded and why the state service is not what it should be are disclosed in a preliminary report of the Senate Civil Service Committee. That document declares that in practically every department there are men doing clerical work worth, perhaps, $1,000 a year who receive salaries of from $2,000 to $3,000. On the other hand, there are instances, one of which is quoted, of clerks receiving about $1,200 for work worth about $2,000. In addition, "advancement of employes in state service is largely a matter of accident," and "length of service, from accident or design, has proved, in fact, a positive handicap." Thus, the average salary of all clerks employed for less than a year is about $150 a year more than the average of all clerks employed from one or two years and $30 a year more than the average of all clerks employed from three to four years.

Such a condition may imply present-day recognition of the increased cost of living, but it is manifestly unfair to the older clerks, whose experience should count for something to the state and themselves, if they be worth keeping at all. The trouble seems to be that advancement and compensation depend largely on the department head and are, to some extent at least, bound up with personal or partisan politics. That is by no means in keeping with the spirit of the Civil Service Law, nor is it for the good of the public service.—N. Y. Tribune.

REASON TO FEAR

The only failure a man has reason to fear is his failure to cling close to common sense.

The farmer who would put his entire place to cabbage is certainly gambling with two things—the season and the market on cabbage. Out where I live, we would call this farmer "short" on common sense.

The investor who willingly, deliberately imports risks into his business of investment by buying securities that have gone mad, is certainly filling his cup with rose-water optimism.

Investing in the insane stocks of the moment will soon cause some folks to be whimpering, "It's just my luck!"

The man who wails of his "luck" has brains about as big as the whiskered end of a two-forked radish.

For me personally to recommend to you any one security as above another security in value, in attractiveness, would be assuming a knowledge that no man can possess without he has definite data on your personal equation—on your individual interests and their relative demands.

But there is an investment that any man can make with more or less civic pride, and certainty of profit, and this is in public-service corporation securities.

A well-managed local street-railway company or a heat, light and power plant can make you, as a rule, more money than you can make in any other way, and do it without the usual chance of taking a risk.—The Silent Partner.

THE COUNTRY'S BEST ASSURANCE

What this country needs is adequate Protection, and we must have it in order to hold the foreign trade which the present impetus has given us. Unless we have this Protection, we shall see ourselves sliding down the commercial scale like a small boy on a big toboggan on a long, slick hill.

Business is business, and every man in business is trying to do the best he can for himself. Nations do not differ. A lame Tariff is a great menace to a country; a properly adjusted Tariff is a country's best assurance of continued prosperity. Let us profit by the conspicuous example of Germany and see to it that the Free-Trade bogy gets a smash in the solar plexus and every otherwhere that will knock it out.—Dayton (O.) Journal.

WHERE FASHION CAN'T DICTATE

As for the dictum that "pictures are going out of style" the best advice we can give is, "Don't believe it." Pictures may go out of fashion, for a time, with a few faddists. But they will never go out of style with persons of sense, or artistic appreciation And there are always enough of that kind of people to curb fashion, when it runs to folly, and to make folly unfashionable.

Pictures appeal to an ineradicable instinct of the human mind. From the days of the cave-dwellers, to those of the ultra-refinements of the twentieth century, thew orld has loved pictures. It will never be content with bare walls.

When Rembrandt, Rubens and Sir Joshua Reynolds filled every nook and cranny of their homes with pictures, they both followed and set an example which will persist forever.

There are things which fashion can't dictate. Proscription of pictures is one of them. The fashionable folk who are selling their paintings, will find themselves badly out of fashion one of these days, for even the faddists will get tired of doing without pictures, and soon will come a swing of the "style" pendulum, meaning that the inevitable reaction in favor of pictures has set in.—Buffalo Times

ATE OUR FIGS

Here is something about which we might go to war with Turkey: The Turkish soldiers have eaten all our Smyrna figs, and like the core of the schoolboy's apple, "there won't be none."

We ought to have 100,000,000 lbs. of figs from Smyrna during the year 1916, and the indications are that we will not have even 100 pounds. Smyrna is a part of the Turkish empire and it may be reached from the Mediterranean sea. Its chief distinction has been its crop of figs and some portions of this have found their way into almose every provision store in this country. Figs are valuable as food, and for centuries have been a mainstay in the eastern countries. Food is scarce in the Turkish empire because of theg reat demands made by the war, and so the Turkish soldiers and the inhabitants of the country in which figs are raised have been compelled to seize the figs intended for export, and they have been consumed. We might not be able to get back a single box of fruit if we should go to war about it now, and should order the entire navy to the other side of the ocean and land our bluejackets in the ancient city of Smyrna itself; but of course we would have the satisfaction of fighting to defend our rights to a delicacy which we enjoy, and which has been rudely taken away from us by Turkish soldiers.

The common remark that a thing "is not worth a fig" may have new significance during the year, for the worth of figs is sure to increase. There are other sources of supply, but they will in no manner fill the demand, and of course with the Turkish crop out of the market, there will be no competition and the price will naturally advance. California produces figs—not nearly as nice ones as does Symrna—and the fig growers in that State will be in clover if it chance that they have a good yield the coming season.

However, we must not lose sight of the fact that there is a fresh outrage against this country, and some one ought to be able to discover in it sufficient cause for war.

Colonel Roosevelt to the front!—Utica Observer.

The Decoy

By RYLAND BELL

The great decisive campaigns of the world have their place in history and are as well known as the large cities of the world. The conquest of America, which extended over several centuries, is comparatively little known. It was achieved almost entirely by citizens who, to make new homes for themselves, wrested a wilderness from the savages. None of its many parts is more thrilling than the possession of that region which embraces Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky by the Virginias.

One day during the emigration that set in from Virginia to this region in the latter part of the eighteenth century John May, his clerk and a man named Skiles embarked on a flatboat—the parlor car of that period—and began the descent of the Ohio river. At Point Pleasant they were joined by one Flinn and his two sisters. Indians inhabited both banks of the river, and it was necessary to keep a sharp watch night and day. Savage warfare was what it had always been—not open fighting, but cunning. The red men rarely attacked a boat in the river, but practiced all sorts of acts to decoy the emigrants to the shore, where an ambush was set. One of the devices was to compel captive whites to call out to the travelers that they had escaped from Indians and beg to be taken aboard.

One morning at daylight the watch awakened the crew with the information that there were fires below. At the same time two white men came down to the river bank on the side of the fires and begged to be taken aboard. They told a plausible story as to how they had been captured and how they had escaped, stating that if left they would likely be retaken. May, who was familiar with Indian devices, turned a deaf ear to their entreaties. He asked them what had caused the fires below, and they professed ignorance of them. May was by this convinced that the men were decoys and kept the middle of the stream. While they were talking the men were running on the shore to keep pace with the boat, pleading in despairing tones to be saved from torture and death.

This was too much for the women, who were in favor of landing and taking the fugitives aboard. Flinn was soon won over; May held firm for awhile, but was at last persuaded. He consented to run near enough to the bank to permit Flinn to wade ashore and have a nearer view of and question the two men. By the time this was decided on the boat had drifted a mile beyond the latter. The boat was pulled to the bank, and Flinn stepped ashore.

Several Indians stepped out from cover, seized him and fired on the boat. Two of the men sprang to their guns, the third, May, to an oar. His only hope was to get the boat again into the current. He called to the others to drop their rifles and help him, but the fire was so hot that they sank down for shelter. The boat lay still while the Indians kept pouring in lead. One of the women was killed, Skiles badly wounded, and there was nothing for May to do but surrender. When he arose to do so he was shot dead.

The Indians now went out to the boat, scalped the dead and made captives of the party. They were joined by the two decoy white renegades, and all spent the night on the river bank.

In the morning three flatboats made their appearance. They were in charge of Thomas Marshall and his son. The Indians forced their prisoners to man the oars of the captive boat, which was headed for the channel to intercept those coming down. Those in Marshall's boats saw their danger and made what preparations they could for defense. The first two boats, though exposed to a heavy fire from the Indians, passed on down and escaped.

Marshall commanded the last boat. The Indians while attempting to reach it got out of the current. Their prisoners rowed in such a way as purposely to make little headway. Taking advantage of this, the second boat allowed the third to overtake it, and, transferring the passengers, the third was set adrift. Then, the oars and rowers available being doubled, the whole party made their escape.

This yielding to the pleadings of the white decoys, taken with other cases, resulted in some very unmerciful refusals to take aboard real escaped prisoners. A Colonel Downing had been captured and marched into the Indian country north of the Ohio river by an old Indian and his son. One evening as the Indian went for water the prisoner picked up a tomahawk, followed him and killed him. The young man sprang upon him, but was thrown off wounded and escaped to the river. A flatboat came by, and Downing begged to be taken aboard. Those on board not only turned a deaf ear to his entreaties, but the boat was turned to the opposite shore. Other boats came along, and the fugitive ran along the shore, pleading with them to save him. All refused till at last a man consented to come ashore for him in a canoe.

How many white men who had been captured by Indians and escaped were left to be retaken on account of the practices of the decoys is uncertain, but there were probably a number of them, for during the opening up of the country the emigrants and settlers were constantly falling into the hands of the savages.

SAVINGS CAMPAIGN APPEALS TO PEOPLE

This year the savings banks of the United States will celebrate the completion of 100 years since their establishment in this country.

Thefi rst savings bank appears to have been founded in Brunswick, Germany, in 1765. In the latter part of this century several banks of this kind were established in different parts of Germany and Switzerland. They were introduced to the notice of the English public by Jeremy Benthem, who in 1797 proposed a well-devised system of "frugality banks," to constitute a branch of the pauper system of the Government. In 1798 the Rev. Joseph Smith of Wendover proposed to the poor of his parish to receive from them during the summer sums as small in value as two-pence, which he would return to them in the winter season, with an addition of one-third as a reward for their providence. Of course, this was more benefiecence than banking. The scheme of Mrs. Priscilla Wakefield of Tottenham embraced the deposit of moneys by women and children only, to whom pensions were to be granted when they reached a certain age. Money was allowed to be withdrawn only in exceptional cases. In 1801 the scheme was somewhat expanded, and a savings bank incorporated as a feature. A more practical organization of this effort was affected in 1804. An undertaking was organized in Bath in 1808 for the benefit of domestic servants only, which approached more nearly the ideal of savings banks, as subsequently defined and understood than those previously considered. The first savings bank of the modern type in Great Britain was organized by the Rev. Henry Duncan of Ruthwell, Scotland, in 1810. The success, as compared with previous efforts, was marked and decisive, and the fame given to it through the writings and labors of Dr. Duncan directly promoted the organization of savings banks upon a similar plan in various parts of the kingdom. The Edinburgh Savings Bank, though claiming an earlier origin, appears to have been established in 1814. It adopted a less complex and more popular form of organization and procedure than that of Dr. Duncan, and this became the model upon which savings banks were organized thereafter. In 1817 two acts were passed by the British Parliament designed to encourage, protect and regulate savings banks.

The successful organization of savings banks in Great Britain attracted attention in the United States. The first organization of which there is any record was affected in the city of New York on November 29, 1816. The first to go into practical operation was the Philadelphia Savings Fund Society, which is a purely voluntary association began to receive deposits on December 2, 1816, thus indicating that it was organized prior to the association in New York. The first organization to become incorporated was the Provident Institution for Savings in Boston—December 13, 1816—and it organized and began business in the spring of 1817. Thus the U. S. anticipated Great Britain in giving to this interest the sanction and protection of law. Soon after banks in Salem, Mass., and Baltimore began business, and their examples were soon followed by others.

In 1820 there were in the country 10 savings banks, withd epositors numbering 8,635 and total deposits amounting to $1,138,370. Today we have in 48 States of the Union, 2,100 savings banks, 634 of the mutual type and 1,466 of the stock type; more than 11,000,000 depositors and over $5,000,000,000 deposited, and approximate average of $455 for each account and a per capita average of about $50. In addition to the mutual and stock savingsb anks and the build ing and loan associations, the national banks and State banks, which are ordinarily called commercial banks and also trust companies, accept savings deposits. Here they are called savings or interest departments of the bank. It is therefore readily seen that the people have plenty of places to save their money and allow it to accumulate. The average rate of interest paid on savings accounts in the United States is 3 1-2 per cent. per annum.

The strength of a nation's savings is found in the proportion of savers to population. The United States has 11 per cent. of its popultion savers. When compared with France we sink into insignificance, for France has 34.6 per cent. of its population depositors in savings banks. It is a sure indication that the people of the United States, as a class, are spenders rather than savers, living month after month and year after year right up to the last cent of their income. It is eminently fitting, therefore, as pointed out by Victor A. Lersue, chairman of the Savings Banks Centennial Committee, that a campaign be conducted illustrating the thriftlessness and wastefulness of the American people. In 1913 the savings bank section of the American Bankers' Association conceived the idea of devising some plan of activity and usefulness that would fruly typify thep rime objects of its members and be representative of the great organization of which it is a part, To succeed in such an enterprise meant to have the hearty co-operation of theb anks, with a striking appeal to all the people throughout the land. Conscious that no nation can long survive or the individual acquire real success unless thrift be present as a virtue, the section inaugurated a campaign of thrift to teach the people its value and expose the deadliness of waste. It was considered the most ambitious work the section had ever undertaken.

ANIMALS IN THE WAR.

A Record in the Variety Used Made in the Present Conflict.

In no other war in the world's history have so many kinds of animals been employed in the actual conduct of hostilities. The list of beasts engaged in the present conflict includes horses, mules, dogs, oxen, elephants, goats and camels. Dogs are doing sentry duty, hauling light guns and serving with the ambulance corps. Goats are necessary to provide food for the Indian troops attached to the army divisions of Great Britain, and elephants, where the climatic conditions permit of their employment, are used in handling heavy timber. Camels have proved invaluable in the Turkish campaign and, already, as is the case with all beasts of burden, their value has increased tremendously.

Experts have recently begun to give serious attention to the problem of keeping up the supply of the various animals necessary for the vast operations of the hostile forces, and the prediction is freely made that if the war continues another year the supply will not be equal to filling a tenth of the demand.—Boston Herald.

How to be Happy

Happiness is not only a condition of the mind but more often a condition of the body. You may learn something from the experience of Mrs. William Troute, Ilion, N. Y., who was sick for a long time from a badly disordered stomach. "I felt miserable all of the time," she writes. "I was tired and had no appetite. A friend advised me to take Chamberlain's Tablets. I did so and my appetite improved and I gained rapidly in health. Two bottles of them restored me to my former health."

TO FIGHT LABOR UNIONS.

Large Industrial Concerns Combine to Head Off Strikes.

Several national labor unions have begun the circulation among their members of a document which says that representatives of various big industrial concerns have been busy devising means of combating a series of great national strikes expected after the European war.

"Five men," says this document, "representing approximately $14,000,000,000 of capital, at a secret conference at the recent nineteenth annual convention of the National Founders' association at New York city devised ways and means for American industries to cope with the chaotic labor conditions which they believe will follow the war."

The circular says that the five men represent the chief industries of America. They are said to be H. Rice, president of the Metal Trades association; Colonel George Pope, president of the National Association of Manufacturers; Albert G. Duncan, president of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, and William H. Barr, president of the National Founders' association. The fifth man is not named.

Mr. Barr is quoted as saying that manufacturers must immediately insist upon corrective measures to bring labor unions within control of the anti-trust law. Colonel Pope is quoted as saying that business interests must organize to meet "unbridled, unwarranted and thoughtless attack" and that legislators must be brought to realize the need for constructive co-operation as regards industrial efficiency.

BACK HOME AFTER 36 YEARS; THOUGHT DEAD

Returns In a Feeble and Needy Condition.

Pittsfield, Mass.—After wandering for thirty-six years all over the country George Churchill has returned to this city. In this interval of years all of his relatives have died except an aged sister, Mrs. George Murdock.

Churchill, after leaving Pittsfield, never communicated with his relatives. They believed him dead. In 1881 Mrs. Murdock read in the newspapers of the death of George Churchill in Ohio. His body had been buried, and the family here believed that the missing George Churchill of Pittsfield was the person who had died.

Recently a gray haired, bearded stranger revealed himself to the old family physician of the Churchills as the long absent George Churchill. From the physician he learned his sister was still living and was eighty-one years old, but in feeble health.

The physician prepared the sister for a meeting with the brother she had so long believed to be dead. Churchill, now aged sixty-nine, and his elder sister, so worn with age that she is being cared for, were brought together again. Mrs. Murdock was greatly shocked by the reappearance of her brother.

Churchill's story is one of wanderlust. He was a woodworker when he went away, and he followed his trade for years. New processes of labor saving machinery forced him to abandon his trade. He turned his hand to cooking, and for a long time worked in hotels and restaurants.

"All the years," he said, "I have been wanting to come back to see the folks. I couldn't get started. Now I'm old and worn out and there seemed to be no other place for me to go."

Churchill's health is broken, and he can no longer work. He will be provided for by friends of the Churchill family.

Progressives Think Republicans Might Accept the War Lord

Chicago—The progressives want peace. They believe they and the republicans can ride to victory next November on the broad issue of Americanism and geniune and sweeping national defence.

In choosing June 7 as thed ate for the National Convention in Chicago—the same date selected by the republicans—they took the first definite step today. They are ready to take others. In fact, they are ready to take many.

They blazed away in stinging phrases at the Wilson administration. They declared in a formal statement that it has "earned the contempt of the world." They branded it as cowardly in standing supinely by "while the law of nations has disappeared from the earth." They announcer unanimously that they are willing to lay aside partisanship in the interest of political peace and Americanism. They indicated beyond all doubt that they love their principles, but also love tranquility and victory. Denying that, in adopting resolutions with olivs branches gorgeously entwined about them, they are laying the last spadeful of earth upon a lost cause, the leaders say they are acting not as politicians but as statesmen.

Their formal utterance today is in reality their platform. Furthermore, it has the unconditional approval of Theodore Roosevelt. The progressives hope to induce the republicans to nominate him. They will spport some one else if that some one else measures up to their standard. They won't say much concerning thep ossible identity of a candidate who would be satisfactory to them. They would take Justice Hughes. They might take Theodore E. Burton. They would consider others They m-i-g-h-t take almose any one except Elihu Root.

A great deal will depend on the manner in whic hthe republicans make the nomination next June. If the "machine" rides roughshod over them they will nominate Mr. Rosevelt. And Mr. Roosevelt will run. Such at least was the information given by the progressives at the meeting of their National Committee today.

They don't speak of any one else except Mr. Roosevelt as their own nominee in case the republicans displease them.

"THE CHILDREN OF EVE," COMES TO QUIRK TODAY

When Henry Clay Madison lent himself to a mild flirtation ina boarding house, he little realized that in after years, when he attained wealth, social standing and apparently happines, that that flirtation would be recalled to his mind in a most startling, tragic manner. The tale of flirtation and its sequence is told in the "Children of Eve," an Edison photodrama, released through the Klein-Edison Feature Service at the Quirk Theatre today.

A woman's wonderful love, cherished as a sacred thing by her, even though she was a woman of the world, proved the germinating seed for a tragedy involving lives of at least three persons and carrying only sorrow and death with it.

MUST GET PERMISSION BEFORE CUTTING UP ROAD

Watertown—The local office of the state highway department calls attention to the fact that permits for the cutting up of state roads for the purpose of laying water pipes, sewer and drain pipes, etc., must be secured before thew ork is done.

In the highway law this point is brought out clearly and a severe penalty may be enforced against those who violate thep rovisions. The rush applies not only to individuals such as farmers along whose property the road runs, but also to corporations and to villages.

There have been reports of alleged violations brought to the offic and it is frequently found that owners of property cut up the road immediately upon application for a permit.

WOULD PUT IMMIGRANTS ON ABANDONED FARMS

Senator Elon R. Brown proposes the rehabilitation of abandoned farms in Northern New York by the introduction of immigrants following the European war. The senator makes this suggestion in a letter to the Farm Bureau Monthly, the official publication of the Jefferson county farm bureau, Senator Brown in his letter says:

"This could best be done through a census of unoccupied houses in rural sections, theu se of which would be given for a specified period to such desirable settlers. The settlers should be selected from one country as Belgium, Germany or Great Britain. This would make them feel at home. To have a foreigner alone in the country would mean his early departure.

"If such ap roject could be carried out it would give a healthy increase to our population, do a great service to humanity, furnish abundant labor for working our farms, and, best of all furnish a much needed source of assistance to the farmers' housewives throughout the county. The women of these new settlers would be available for this service. It would in my opinion give a great impetus and advantage to our section. I hope the farm bureau will take it up. It is my intention to press for an appropriation by the state to aid in his work.

"Elon R. Brown."

KNITTING CENTER, MOHAWK VALLEY

Government Investigation Finds Business on a Whole Sound and Prosperous.

Foreign underwear no longer is fashionable in the United States. The average buyer may have no very definite idea of the origin of the underwear he purchases at the store, but the fact that he no longer demands "something imported" is one of the significant and encouraging signs of the times. The total output of American-made knit underwear in 1909 was valued at $84,446,000, according to statistics contained in a report on the subject just issued by the bureau of foreign and domestic commerce, whereas the imports of cotton knit underwear for the year previous to the war were valued at only $342,000. Cotton underwear forms the bulk of the imports of this class of wearing apparel.

The new report on the knit underwear industry is the result of a close study of the situation in this country by the cost of production division of the bureau of foreign and domestic commerce, and it is the third of a series on the cost of producing wearing apparel prepared for the assistance of Congress when tariff legislation is being considered, the work of the bureau in this respect being exactly similar to that of the old tariff board. The earlier reports were studies of the muslin underwear and the hosiery industries. As with the other reports it was the original intention to make a study of the conditions in the knit underwear industry in the principal manufacturing countries in Europe, but the war has made it impossible to carry out such a plan.

The knit underwear industry in the United States has had a rapid growth in recent years, the increase in output from 1899 to 1909 amounting to more than 70 per cent., and since 1909, although exact figures are not available, theg rowth has been fully as satisfactory. The industry is widely scartered but a large proportion of the cotton knit underwear is manufactured in Utica, Amsterdam and other places in the Mohawk Valley. Cohoes is an important center for the manufacture of woolen knit underwear.

Sixty-three establishments were covered by the bureau in its study of the industry, and these concerns reported capital employed in the business amounting to $18,126,026. For these companies the average manufacturing profit on net sales was 5.73 per cent., per cent., and on capital employed in business, 8.45 per cent. Twenty-eight establishments had a manufacturing profit of more than 10 per cent. on capital. The report reaches the conclusion, therefore, that the industry as a whole was in a prosperous condition during the normal times before the war. The fact that some mills are ordinarily more prosperous than others is attributed in a measure to the difference in mechanical equipment and to the inferior cost-accounting methods used in some mills. It is anticipated that the criticisms in this respect will arouse as much discussion as did similar comments in the report on the hosiery industry. As to the property of the industry since the war started, there is of course no question.

As in the closely related hosiery industry a very marked tendency is noticed toward direct sales from manufacturer to retailer. Direct sales now amount to more than 23 per cent. of the total, and although this is considerably behind the percentage of hosiery sold direct, it represents an important increase within the last 10 years. The advantages and disadvantages of direct sales are given considerable attention in the report.

The use of antiquated machinery and the failure to keep machinery in proper condition are given as causes of low profits in some mills. There have been many improvements in machinery in recent years, and mills that have continued to use the old-type machines are finding themselves at a decided, disadvantage, without being aware, in some cases of the real cause of the trouble.

In spite of certain adverse criticisms, however, the report as a whole indicates that the knit underwear industry is in a soundly prosperous condition and that there is no reason to suppose that the future promises anything but a continuance of that prosperity. Now that the industry has developed sufficiently to meet the enormous home demand, it is more than likely that American-made knit underwear will find its way in increasing quantities into the most promising foreign markets.

A large part of the report is devoted to capital, profit and turnover, cost and profit by establishments and costs and profits by specified units, and these chapters contain many statistical tables compiled by specially engaged experts. There are, in addition, chapters on cost accounting, manufacturing processes, machinery used in the industry, working conditions, and the problems connected with establishing trade with foreign countries. The report is entitled "The Knit Goods Industry," miscellaneous series No. 32, and is sold by the superintendent of documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, and by the district offices of the bureau of foreign and domestic commerce, for 20 cents a copy.

BASKET BALL MEET TONIGHT

A basketball carnival is scheduled for tonight at Church's Hall, in which six teams will participate, two from Oswego, one representing Phoenix, and three local teams.

Aside from the Boy Scouts-Phoenix High school game, most of the interest is centered on the main event of the evening, the duel between the Oswego Normal and local Maccabee quintets. No attempt is being made to forecast the result of this game as both teams are conceded to be about equally matched and victory will come to the team which secures the lead from the start, it is expected.

With only two defeats to mar their oherwise clean record and these defeats handed to them in the first part of the season when the team had not been organized or had opportunity for practice, the Maccabees are confident of securely binding down the championship title of Oswego County after tonight's game, as the victory over the school team will leave the local boys undisputed holders of the title.

O'Brien and Ives will likely be the forwards in the Maccabees lineup, with Crockett at center. The guards will be selected from Snow, Ward Smith, Rohrball and Freedman. The last-named five men are about equally matched and Captain Ives has been unable to decide on permanent holders of theg uard positions.

Special seating arangements have ben made or tonight's program as a large delegation of Oswego rooters will accompany the teams to this city.

SHORT AND TRAGIC

Career of the First Submarine Used In Real War.

SHE WAS BUILT IN MOBILE.

Constructed of Boiler Iron and Crude In Design, She Was Operated Against the Federal Ship Housatanic With Disastrous Results.

It is a fact that a submersible boat did actual service in the war between the states and was perhaps the first practical submarine used in actual warfare.

The boat was built in Mobile in 1864 by two men named Hundley and McClintock. It was of boiler iron, sharp at both ends and was about thirty feet long, five or six feet in beam and five or six feet deep. It was propelled by a screw, the shaft of which ran horizontally along the hold, almost from stem to stern and was turned by eight men, who sat four on each side of the shaft.

The only hatchway, placed well forward, was two feet in diameter, and it was closed by an iron cap that worked on a hinge and was airtight. In the forward part of the cap there was a clear glass bullseye, through which the pilot could see. The boat had water tight compartments, by filling or emptying which it could sink or rise. A ballast of iron rails was placed outside the hull, and by means of keys they could be detached so that the boat could rise instantly if necessary.

Besides a rudder, the boat had side paddles, or fins, which could be used to guide it up or down through the water.

The boat could go perhaps four knots an hour. It could remain submerged for half an hour or an hour without serious inconvenience to its crew, and once it remained as long as two hours under water without actual injury to them.

A floating torpedo was fastened to the boat by a line 100 feet long, and the inventor proposed that the boat should dive beneath the keel of the enemy's vessel and haul the torpedo after her. The triggers or sensitive primers of the torpedo would press against the ship's bottom, explode the torpedo and sink the vessel.

The boat was sent to Charleston to operate against the blockading fleet. General Beauregard had the torpedo fastened to the bow. It terminated in front with a sharp lance head, so that when the boat was driven against a ship the lance head would be forced into the ship below the water line and the torpedo fastened against the side. The boat was then to back off and explode the torpedo by a lanyard.

General Beauregard called on the Confederate fleet for volunteers, and Lieutenant Payne, a Virginian, and eight sailors volunteered. On the evening fixed for the expedition the crew had embarked, and the boat was submerged until only the combings of her hatch were above water. Lieutenant Payne was standing in the hatchway when the swell of a passing steamer rolled over the boat, and it sank instantly with her eight men. Lieutenant Payne sprang out of the hatchway as the boat sank, and he alone was saved.

In a few days she was raised, and again Payne volunteered and with him eight more men. The embarkation for the second attempt was made at Fort Sumter, and, as before, all being made ready, Payne, standing at his post in the hatchway, gave orders to cast off, when the boat careened and sank instantly. Payne sprang out, two of the men followed him, and the other six went down with the boat and perished.

Again the boat was raised, and her owner, Captain Hundley, took her for an experimental trip to Stone river, where, after going through her usual evolutions, she dived into deep water and disappeared. After a week's search she was found at an angle of forty degrees, her nose driven into the deep, soft mud of the bottom.

Her crew of nine men were standing, sitting or lying about in her hold, asphyxiated. Hundley had died at his post with a candle in one hand, while with the other he had been vainly trying to unclamp the hatch. The angle at which the boat had gone down had jammed the keys so that the men could not cast off the iron ballast that held them down.

Again the ill fated vessel was prepared for action, and volunteers were called for. Lieutenant Dixon of the Twenty-first Alabama volunteered and eight men with him.

The ship Housatonic was selected for attack and on a quiet night the brave crew set out from Charleston. Lieutenant Dixon guided the boat straight to the Housatonic, and the explosion tore open the ship's side, so that she went down with all her crew in two minutes.

The torpedo vessel never returned, and whether she went down with her enemy or drifted out to sea was long unknown. Many years after, in the work of deepening the bar off Charleston harbor, divers in submarine armor visited the wreck of the Housatonic and found the little torpedo vessel lying by her huge victim, and within her the bones of as devoted and daring men as ever went to sea.

In the history of the submarine certainly the Hundley is entitled to honorable mention.—Youth's Companion.

MAGIC OF IRRIGATION.

Story of the Rice Fields of Southern Louisiana.

In 1888 lowlands in southern Louisiana near the bayous suitable for growing sugar cane, corn and cotton could be purchased for $3.50 an acre, and the prairie lands back from the bayous could be bought for $1 an acre. With almost the first crop under irrigation however, the values showed a marked rise and have continued to increase. In the first five years the value of the best rice lands rose to $10 an acre, and soon after that it rose to $30 and even $50 an acre.

The first people to plant rice in southern Louisiana, according to the United States geological survey, were the Acadians, who, after their expulsion from Nova Scotia by the English in 1755, settled in considerable numbers in Louisiana. Their cultivation of rice, almost primitive in its methods, was confined to the lowlands along the bayous, the prairies affording pasturage for the Acadians' herds of cattle. Few of the lowland areas admitted of satisfactory drainage, and they were too small for profitable cultivation. The crops frequently failed in years of deficient rainfall. Attempts were made to create additional water supplies by building levees across low sags or coulees at points higher than the cultivated areas, but generally either the rainfall proved deficient or the reservoirs were too small.

Little advance was made over the Acadian methods until recent years. Experiments in unusually wet years had shown that the soils of the prairies were adapted to the growth of rice if sufficient water was at hand. This led to the trial of pumps as a means of raising water from the bayous to the rice fields. So successful was the test that pumps were at once installed at many points, and in a few years tens of thousands of acres of previously almost useless land, lying ten to seventy feet above the bayous, were put under cultivation. The first large pump was installed in 1894 on the Bayou Plaquemine, in Acadia parish, near Crowley.

OUR UNRULY SUN.

It Seems to Be Trying to Dilate to the Bursting Point.

The French astronomer Puiseux has been busying himself with the constitution of the sun. He finds that, instead of condensing and shrinking little by little, as was formerly supposed, the sun is constantly dilating more and more and reaching the point of bursting. And if the sun blew up there would be no more need for us poor mortals to worry about worldly affairs.

Big suns every whit as important in their own constellations as ours are frequently victims of an explosion. There was one in the constellation of Perseus early in 1901, and since then two at least have occurred in other celestial groups.

Observation has shown long since that the great orb which is our all in all is a most uncertain character. Sun spots, fire blasts and such like phenomena are by no means the most of which he is capable. The manner in which the sun throws off atomic energy and transforms the heavy into light elements, hydrogen, helium, nebulium, archonium and what not spells nothing good for this world, and a mere nothing might lead to a disaster any day.

In short, it is bound to come at some time or other. Unfortunately science can give us no idea as to when. Centuries and even hundreds of centuries are as but a moment in the history of the universe, says Professor Flammarion, and for all we know the sun may have millions of years more life before it. No man can tell, though, and, just as the strongest of us are struck down in a moment, so the all powerful planet may give out at any time, and when it does it will make but short work of all of us here below.—Boston Transcript.

Argentina's Natural Bridge.

In Argentina there is a natural bridge that is one of the most wonderful in the world. It spans the Rio Mendoza and is known as the Inca bridge. But it is the work of nature, says the Scientific American, and not, as was popularly supposed, of the Incas. The road on which it occurs was probably a colonial highway made by the Peruvian Incas, who took advantage of the phenomenon by leading their road over this natural viaduct.

Origin of Spoons.

Two natural objects seem to have furnished the model for the spoon to primitive man—the river or sea shell and the leaf of plants. In southern China shell spoons are still used that are closely reproduced in the familiar porcelain spoon of that country, while metal spoons are found in India on which are reproduced even the veins of the leaves from which they were copied.

Doctor (cuttingly)—Are you to be allowed to drink beer, eh? Didn't I tell you just a week ago to let the stuff alone? Patient—I know, doctor; but you see, I thought there might have been some progress in medical science since.—New York Post.

"Your wife has a muscular affection which renders her speechless. I can cure her, but it will take time."

"Take all the time you want, doc," responded the mean man.—Kansas City Journal.

The Villa On the Hill

By EUNICE BLAKE

Sherbourne was one of those young men into whose laps an unjust fate pours boundless wealth.

Sherbourne's pile was about twenty millions. At twenty-one he found himself in possession of it all, and it was so well invested that he had nothing to do but put it in bank as fast as it came in. He soon tired of this and hired a man to do it for him. Then he went abroad to see the world.

One day while running about in an auto in Italy he saw a girl crossing the road ahead of him. She was dressed neither as a peasant nor a lady, but between the two. In her hand she carried a basket of berries. On a hill near by was an imposing villa. Sherbourne was wondering who lived there when he reached the girl crossing the road.

"Can you tell me, signorina," he asked in a mixture of Italian and Latin, seasoned with a little English, "who inhabits that villa up there on the hill?"

"The Princess Angela Farini."

"Much land with it?"

"Many acres, signor."

"H'm," said Sherbourne half to the girl and half musingly. "I wonder if it is for sale."

"Are you an American?" she asked.

"Yes. Why do you ask?"

"You Americans wish to buy everything you see. I don't think you can buy this place, however."

"I presume there is no harm in trying, is there?"

"Oh, no!"

"I don't think land can be worth much about here. The more a person owns the worse he is off on account of the taxes."

"You might make the princess an offer. She is alone in the world, her parents being dead. She is much attached to the place, but on account of loneliness would prefer city life."

"Thank you very much for your information." And Sherbourne drove on.

When Sherbourne came to the entrance of the place he turned in and ascended the hill, admiring the expanding view as he rose. He thought that he would like to settle down on the place, collect a library and spend his days reading. He had not yet reached an age where a man realizes that a home is no home at all without a woman in it. At any rate, he made up his mind to buy it, and when Bob Sherbourne made up his mind to buy anything he considered it as good as purchased. Driving up to the entrance of the villa he alighted.

"I have called," he said to a liveried lackey who admitted him "to ask if the Princess Farini would consider an offer for her place."

The flunkey showed the visitor into a cosy reception room, then disappeared. Presently he returned and asked how much the signor would give. Sherbourne made an offer of 500,000 lire ($100,000). The lackey, after several trips to and from the would be purchaser, at last brought him a card of a real estate agent in Rome, with a message that the agent would deal with him. He went to Rome and finally purchased the place and everything in it for half a million dollars.

He had occupied it a month when one day while driving by a small villa near the foot of the hill on which his place stood he saw the signorina he had met in the road some time before. She was dressed like a lady and was watering some flowers. Sherbourne pulled up, lifted his hat and told her that he had made the purchase of which he had spoken to her, adding that he was sorry he had done so—he had found it lonely. The lady said that she had heard the princess was sorry she had sold her home. After some further conversation, during which it came out that the lady knew the princess, she said she would see her and learn if she would buy it back. Sherbourne was to call for a reply the next day.

When he called he was invited into the villa, and negotiations were opened, this time the princess dealing through her friend instead of the agent. The friend proved attractive, and Sherbourne prolonged the bargaining in order to enjoy her society. At the end of a month she had him enthralled. He proposed to her and was accepted.

Sherbourne now declared that he would not sell his villa. He and his bride would occupy it together. To this his fiancee agreed, but later said that she would not like to offend the princess, who had been kind to her, and Sherbourne was obliged to resell his place. His fiancee, however, informed him that the princess had graciously permitted her to be married in the villa on the hill.

When the day of the wedding came round Sherbourne drove to his former abode, and when his bride appeared he noticed that she wore a coronet. Surprised, he asked if her friend the princess had loaned it to her for the bridal.

"I am the princess," was the reply.

"You the princess!" exclaimed the groom.

"Yes; the day I met you I was roaming about my property in common costume, as is my habit, to pick berries. I saw that you were a rich American and concluded to sell my property to you, which is all I have of worldly goods. Then it occurred to me to get it back with you also."

"You need not take me with it unless you like," said Sherbourne, miffed.

"I like."

Don't Be a Drudge

Housework with its ceaseless, humdrum duties often causes a woman to "go to seed," to become listless and indifferent to both her personal appearance and what is going on around her. She fails to make her work agreeable, to keep her mind freshened and alert. The successful girl or woman in the business world realizes the importance of keeping her mind brightened and of doing her work in such a way that it will come easier. The result is each day is met with the right thought, the work is done systematically, and the worker herself becomes more capable, better fitted to meet the unexpected demands that every little while come up.

"We are not all fitted for housework." we say apologetically. That is why so many of us are failures at it. There is of course some truth in this. Indeed, we are not all fitted for housework, but every woman knows that when she assumes the management of a home she, and she alone, is responsible for the success or failure of the work in that home.

We hear a lot about the "drudgery" of housework, but if women would only study up on it housework would not seem as distasteful as many women seem to think it is. In these days of labor saving devices it seems incredible that women will worry along in the old way of doing things. Tell a woman whose shoulders have become bent from broom sweeping that a carpet sweeper will do the work better and easier and you will not be thanked for your trouble. She will cling to the broom, meanwhile bemoaning the fact that her work is "never done." The old fashioned cook and her coal stove have been landed sky high, but the delicious meals prepared these days in the fireless cooker have the old time cook and her coal fire beaten a dozen different ways.

The woman who has become a household drudge has only herself to blame. No man likes to see his wife in that role. Any woman who can read can make her housework easier and do it better. Take, for instance, the splendid household articles published each day in many papers. Cooking, sewing, caring for babies, the general work of the house, are handled so that every one may learn.

The banker, lawyer—in fact, every professional and business man—read up on his particular work. Why cannot women see the logic of reading up on their household needs? The wife, the mother in her home, has been intrusted with a greater work than the most successful lawyer or banker.

Don't go to seed. Fill your mind with happy thoughts. Stop being a drudge. Even if silver threads are showing in the gold or the darkness of your hair, do it up as prettily as possible. Go out and lose yourself in the gay crowds occasionally. Forget all about yourself. The walk will bring roses into your cheeks, and when you reach home you'll have a fine appetite for supper. Just try it and see!

A RUN ON RAISINS.

ESCALOPED RAISINS WITH APPLES.—One cupful seeded raisins, one-quarter cupful brown sugar, one quart apples, pared and quartered; one-quarter teaspoonful salt, one-quarter cupful water, one-quarter cupful bread, cracker or cake crumbs, one teaspoonful butter. Brush bake dish or casserole with butter, put in half the raisins, cover with half the apples, dust with salt. Add the balance of raisins, then apples; sprinkle with a little salt, cover with sugar, the water and the crumbs over top and cover. Place in moderate oven on top rack and bake one-half hour, then remove cover and bake fifteen minutes or until brown. This is best served cold. Can be helped from dish in which it has been baked or served in ice cream glasses with whipped cream.

The New Raisin Cooky.—Two cupfuls of seeded raisins, one-half cupful shortening, one cupful sugar, one-quarter cupful milk, one level teaspoonful salt, two eggs, four cupfuls flour or enough flour to roll thin; four teaspoonfuls baking powder. Cream the shortening and sugar together until light, add salt, well beaten eggs, stir until smooth, add milk slowly. Wash and dry the raisins, put through food chopper, add to mixture, sift two cupfuls of flour and baking powder together and add to mixture; add the rest of flour; more may be needed to roll out. Roll about one-eighth of an inch thick and cut with sharp cutter or cut in bars with sharp knife (a sharp cutter is best). Bake eight to ten minutes in hot oven. These are exceptionally good cookies and will keep a long time under lock and key. The chopped raisins make a moist, soft cooky.

New Raisin Cooky Without Eggs.—Two cupfuls seeded raisins, one cupful brown sugar, one-half cupful shortening, one cupful baking molasses, one teaspoonful salt, one-half cupful boiling water or sour milk, one teaspoonful baking soda; five cupfuls flour. Put sugar, shortening and molasses into bowl, rub until smooth; add salt, baking soda which has been dissolved in water. Add raisins which have been washed, dried and put through food shopper, sift flour and work into a dough so it can be rolled out a quarter of an inch thick. More flour may be added if needed. Cut with floured cooky cutter and bake in hot oven eight to ten minutes. Ginger or cinnamon may be added if desired.

MARRYING SQUIRES BUSY.

So Busy They Want to Put an End to "Runners" In Jeffersonville, Ind.

Jeffersonville, Ind.—Some of the six justices of the peace of Jeffersonville who fight among themselves for "marriage couples," are proposing a combination whereby all six would establish central marrying parlors and would pool and divide equally all their earnings.

The chief benefit would be the elimination of the "runners," with whom the justices of the peace now split their fees, which only in exceptional cases amount to more than $3. One result of the competition has been the cutting of fees. Many eloping couples get married for $1 and some for "six bits." Secret weddings generally cost the elopers a little more, and a twenty-five dollar fee shows up once in awhile.

Reno, Nev.—Tombstones are being used for location monuments in the new mining district near Sodaville, where a supposed fabulously rich ledge of tungsten ore was discovered, according to reports brought to Reno by men who answer the call of the desert and mark the boundaries of their claim.

One miner located the village cemetery, and as there were no rocks near he used some of the best looking tombstones to mark the boundaries of his claim.

Others soon followed suit, and now the relatives of the departed, interred three years ago, would have a hard time recognizing one grave from another.

A Subtle Hint of the Orient

IS this design Chinese or Russian? The skirt surely suggests a pagoda. The three tiers of it with the narrow bands of skunk give a distinct effect, helped out by touches of hand embroidery around the peplum, blouse and sleeves. The Russian blouse closes on one side with oddly shaped buttons and fastens as high as a chin-chin. This costume instead of the brave bowed turban appropriately takes the close hat with its Chinese pompon atop.

Youthful In Effect and Very Graceful.

This frock is especially designed for women of youthful figure and is effective in delicate rose crepe—guiltless of contrasting trimming.

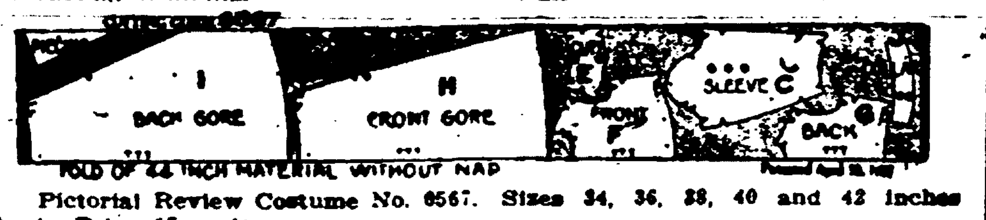
It is the unusual woman to whom a frock of simple crepe does not make a strong appeal. The youthful charm of the newest fashion is well embodied in this design of rose pink crepe, guiltless of contrasting trimming. The neck may be finished in high or low round effect, while the three-quarter sleeves are shirred to fit the arm and finished with self-ruffles. In medium size the dress requires 4¼ yards 44-inch material, with ⅝ yard 36-inch material for underbody front and back.

In cutting out the material, put the back and front gores of the skirt into place first. These are laid on a lengthwise fold of the material, and following the front gore, placed in the same way, is the front of the waist. Between the front of the waist and the back, however, comes the sleeve, laid on a lengthwise thread. To the right of the back section of the waist, which is placed on a lengthwise fold, is placed the collar, but on a lengthwise thread. The cuff is on a lengthwise thread and rests on the unused material found between the armhole of the front of the waist and the selvage edge opposite.

To make the round low neck it will be necessary to cut out the neck edges of underbody and outer front and back on small "o" perforation. If the skirt is desired shorter than illustrated, cut off the lower parts of the gores on small "o" perforations.

This model is sure to be a great favorite for spring and summer, for the soft materials which are to be fashionable lend themselves charmingly to the shirring employed to take in the fulness of the waist.

In chiffon over taffeta or satin this design makes a delectable party frock.



Pictorial Review Costume No. 6567. Sizes 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42 inches bust. Price, 15 cents.

PRACTICAL HEALTH HINT.

Preventing Colds.

Colds frequently result where there is a deformed or diseased nose or tonsil or where there are adenoids. Frequently the bacteria get a better or easier hold there than in the case of people with good noses and throats. Living and sleeping in the fresh air increase one's resistance against colds. Taking a cold sponge bath about the neck, arms and shoulders each morning also helps immensely. Constipation is very frequently an indirect cause of colds and should be strenuously guarded against. Overeating, overheating, especially, dry steam or stove heat in winter, and underexercising are potent causes of colds. Last of all, one should avoid close association with other people having colds, coughs, or grip or those who cough or sneeze without holding handkerchiefs before their faces. Keep a good bunch of fresh air between yourself and the cold victim, and you will be much safer.

For Children's Cough

You cannot use anything better for your child's cough and cold than Dr. King5s New Discovery. It is prepared from Pine Tar mixed with healing and soothing balsams. It does not contain anything harmful and is slightly laxative, just enough to expel the poisons from the system. Dr. King's New Discovery is antiseptic—kills the cold germs,raises the phlegm bowels and expel not ony thew orms irritation. Don't put off treatment. Coughs and Colds often lead to serious lung troubles. It is also good for adults and the aged. Get a bottle today. All Druggists.

KITCHEN CUES.

Simple Ways of Doing Simple Things Intelligently and Well.

To prevent potatoes becoming black when cooked put them into cold water and when brought to the boil squeeze a little lemon juice in. They will then keep a good color and be of good flavor.

Before using tinware of any kind rub it well over with fresh lard. If treated in this way it will never rust.

Slip a thimble on the curtain rod when running it through the hem of the curtain.

The tops of pale covered evening gloves make very dainty shoes for babies.

For a homemade coal box procure a wooden lard bucket from the grocer. Remove the wire handle and clean thoroughly inside and outside with strong soda water, one pound to a gallon of boiling water. Purchase a three penny bottle of oak varnish and when the bucket is dry apply over evenly and quickly. Leave for several hours. Get two penny bronze handles and screw one on each side, and the article is complete. The outside cost of this is a quarter, and it looks as well as one costing several times that amount.

White satin shoes should always be kept in blue paper to prevent them from becoming discolored.

After fowl of any kind is cleaned the inside should be rubbed thoroughly with a piece of lemon before the dressing is put in.

When ivory handled knives look yellow rub them with fine sandpaper or emery. It will take off the spots and restore the whiteness.

If clothespins are dipped in white enamel paint and dried in the sun they can be kept perfectly clean and will not split or mark the clothes.

Tin that has become rusty of stained may be cleaned by dipping the cut surface of a raw potato in fine brick and rubbing well with this.

Unbleached Muslin Spread.

Every woman likes to own a handmade spread, but the majority of spreads call for such expensive materials that few women can afford to indulge in the luxury. However, here is a spread which is within almost every woman's reach. It can be duplicated for about $5. The spread is made of unbleached muslin. All over its surface conventional scrolls are outlined by means of huge French knots. On the spread in question white knots are used, but there is no reason why one could not use colored cotton to carry out the color scheme employed in one's bedroom. The edge of the spread is finished with cotton fringe.

In place of a quilting party why not have a spread party? The work will then be quickly and pleasantly done.

A Kitchen Hint.

Keep a piece of pumice stone in the kitchen to clean the irons with. It will instantly remove those particles of starch that adhere to the iron and will also remove rust or dirt. A careful rubbing with pumice before you put the irons on to heat will prevent any possibility of dirty marks on the delicate linens and laces.

Thrift.

"I've got to take exercise and quit eating so much," said the young man who calculates closely.

"Worried about your health?"

"No. I'm getting so stout my roommate's evening clothes won't fit me."—Washington Star.

Judge by yourself and not by the opinion of others. Misfortunes and disorders arise from false judgments.—Marchioness de Lambera.

A NOVEL HAT.

This Chapeau Has All the Winter Hallmarks of Style.

Brimless, tall crowned and of black velvet, this interesting hat answers two other dictates of fashion, in that it features a stickup of glazed leather edged with fur. This kid wing is secured by two black velvet buttons nattily placed.

JANUARY READINESS.

Chiffon Powder Puff Bags.

It is not a difficult feat to manufacture a wide mouthed bag from pink, blue or lavender chiffon gathered on to a round or oval embroidery ring. Hangers of satin ribbon to match the bag should be fastened across like the handle of a basket and tacked to the ring on either side with rosettes of the ribbon and small chiffon or satin roses. Within the bag put a dozen small puffs made of absorbent cotton, drawn in at one side like a made puff by a string of narrow ribbon. Hung in the guest room or on any dressing table these individual puffs will prove useful where there are visitors, and the puffs can be replaced as those used are thrown away.

Welsh Rabbit.

Cut one or two slices of white bread about a quarter of an inch thick, toast on both sides and butter well. Take half a pound of cheddar cheese, grate it and put it into a small pan with two tablespoonfuls of cream, a teaspoonful of mustard, a dust of pepper, and stir these all together over the fire till the mixture is like cream. Cut the toast into square pieces and place them on a hot dish. Pour the cheese mixture over them and serve at once.

Club Sandwiches.

On a slice of bread put a lettuce leaf, next slices of thin crisp bacon, next slices of chicken and mayonnaise; then cover with a slice of bread and toast lightly on either side.

An Impossible Ideal?

Perhaps, after all, the real danger is not that women will ever forget the value of the home and their obligation to it, but that men will never entirely learn them.

We are indebted to that gifted and charming essayist, Elizabeth Woodbridge, for the following: "To say that it is woman's task to make the home is to miss its most exquisite meaning. No one of the group can make the home, though any one can mar it. It must be made by all for the uses of all."

Well, if it is one thing for all to use the home, it is another thing for all—and by that we mean every one under the rooftree—to help make the home.

And we will probably never learn the true significance of this difference unless we first distinctly understand that making a home is more, far more, than a matter of cooking food and making beds, of fetching and carrying and running the vacuum cleaner.

There can be no quarrel with that division of labor which makes household tasks very largely a woman's business and breadwinning outside the home a man's business.

But after both men and women have accomplished thus much there still remains the finest part of the task of homemaking.

It lies in heart interest, in love for the home as an institution and in a thorough belief in its sacredness. A woman once said, "I can conceive of such a fine interpretation of the meaning and value of home that in case of difficulty or disagreement between two people the very ideal of the home itself would outweigh the personal element and conserve unity."

The idea that two people might be willing to submerge personal differences to the larger ideal of home itself may be an ambitious conception, but surely not impossible. And in this role of homemaker a man may serve as largely and as truly as a woman.

HUGO COMMENDS CANADIAN TIES

New York—The close relationship between this country and Canada was praised last night at the celebration of the thirtieth anniversary of the Canadian club at the Biltmore Hotel, at which Francis M. Hugo, Secretary of State of New York, was the principal speaker. Mr. Hugo was born in Ontario and was graduated from Queen's College.

In referring to the close bonds which unite this country and Canada Mr. Hugo directed attention to the cross currents of immigration between the United States and Canada, which, he said, had resulted in peopling each country with millions of the other's citizens.

"Why shouldn't these great countries be as close as they are, and as I hope they will remain?'.' he asked "Their ideals, the great bond of the Anglo-Saxon race, draw them together. For two centuries they have been one in purpose, and I hope they will always continue one."

Predicting theg reater development of Canada, particularly through the expansion of the great Northwest, Mr. Hugo said her one great question was of freight rates.

"The barge canal of the State, rapidly nearing completion, will help answer that questionf or her," he said. "Theg reat grain shipments from the northwest, the granery of the world, will come to Buffalo and from Buffalo down the canal to New York, and thence abroad."

"If by hyphenated citizen, one means what Charles Nagel defined it, then I am for them," he declared. "Hyphenated meaning allegiance I am against, but hyphenated meaning pride of ancestry I believe in it."

Both Expert In Logic.

"Tom," said a father to his son, whose school report showed him to have been an idle young scamp, "what have you been studying this term?"

"Logic. father," replied Tom. "I can prove you are not here now."

"Indeed! How so?"

"Well, you must be either at Rome or elsewhere."

"Certainly."

"You are not at Rome?"

"No."

"Then you must be elsewhere."

"Just so."

"And if you are elsewhere you clearly can't be here."

For answer the father took up a cane that lay near and laid it smartly across his son's back.

"Don't!" cried Tom. "You are hurting me."

"Not at all. You have just proved conclusively that I am not here, so I can't be hurting you."

Before his stern parent had quite done with him Tom felt that there must be, after all, a flaw somewhere in his logic.—London Tit-Bits.

"Hurt? No," Flanagan replied. "Why, if I'd had on me runnin' shoes I could 'a' le'pt twice as far." Exchange.

VILLA SAID TO HAVE LED BAND OF MURDERERS

El Jaso, Tex.—From telegrams that reached American and British officials and friends and relatives of the murdered men there were learned today grewsome details of the massacre of unarmed citizens of the United States. They proye that the massacre was one of the most fiendish of the hundreds that have marked the course of the revolution in Mexico.

Dragged from the train on which they were en route to resume mining operations in western Chihuahua, their passports from the Carranza officials at Juarez and Chilhuahua scoffed at, the Americans were stripped of their clothing and clubbed, bayonetted or otherwise tortured. Then their bodies were riddled with bullets and left lying beside the track near Santa Ysabel.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

Community building is a difficult and laborious process at best. It requires confidence in the future, the co-operation of men and women, and the bringing together of many elements to make it a success. Under our American concept of individualism, community-building has often been regarded as individual in character. There has been little emphasis laid on the co-operative side, and practically no recognition has been given to the contributions of the social forces to town building.

It is true that in many towns strong men have erected buildings, established banks, created mills and elevators, and done a great deal that has assisted materially the growth of the community. While all of this is desirable and worth the while, in itself it cannot create a town in the best sense of the word. The individual has identified the success of the town in these instances with his own commercial advantage, and has overlooked the important fact that a town has a conscience, point of view, and attitude of its own. This spirit of the town must be alive to the town's condition, ready and alert as an individual of the character of the general citizenship to take on problems and difficulties. Community view and individual interest, moreover, do not always coincide. The basis of the opposition on the part on problems and difficulties. The basis of the opposition on the part of some men to town progress usually is not far to seek. Many times it is due to misunderstanding, to idle gossip, or to competition in a limited field.

Thus the contest for patrons may take on all the bitterness of a hostile strife in a gold camp, and end in merchants having nothing to do with each other in a business or social way (as it is in FULTON).

Instead of ignoring such a situation, some of the members of the community take sides. As a consequence cliques are formed. This results in a DIVISIONAL TOWN, which continues to LOSE GROUND, because there can be NO CENTRALIZATION OF INTERESTS.

If one side favors a proposition the other is opposed to it. NOTHING DEADLIER COULD EXIST than just such a condition. Mark Twain gave the world a number of years ago his "STORY OF THE MAN WHO CORRUPTED HADLEYSBURG." It can hardly be repeated, even in outline, but the COMPLETE OVERTURNING of the virtues of the citizens was due wholly to SUSPICION AND OVERREACHING PROCLIVITIES. Where else could it have happened but in the SMALL community?

Sometimes the strong man of the town INSISTS, THROUGH THE VARIOUS AGENCIES OF CHURCH, SCHOOL BOARD, AND COUNCIL, that his views shall prevail. The spirit of thrift is talked and urged by him not so much FOR THE WELFARE OF INDIVIDUALS as that tenants may pay rent and debtors settle promptly their obligations. If the theology of his church maintains this view, he is strongly set against the new thought that might in any way loosen the bond of obligation and throw doubts on the rendering to Caesar what is due. So the teacher is expected to inculcate the doctrines of ownership and the right to charge what the traffic will bear, while the town council is instructed to turn contracts over to those who are big taxpayers and consequent benefactors of the community. It is hard to get a man of such views to accept the social concept of a town's development, because his interest and his thought have all centered about individual effort.

Besides this deterring element of individualism is another of EVEN MORE SERIOUSNESS which creeps into every community as it takes on added importance and increase of population. The old time neighborliness of the early days of the village, when the difference between the well-to-do and the poorer members of the community was merely a difference of physical comfort won by the sweat of the brow, has DISAPPEARED and been SUPERSEDED by many artificial distinctions in family and social life. Inherited wealth makes possible the enjoyment of pleasures and more intimate touch with the outside world; and as wealth is concentrated, social distinctions arise and class lines appear as a factor in the town problems. This condition is noticeable in the utilization of the most attractive locations in the town for the best residences and the creation of a desirable section to which those able to afford it move.

Churches, too, come to be designated as fashionable churches (THIS IS A SHAME). and the town in its increase of population is marked by distinctions that affect the "get-together" spirit of the place.

In sections of the country where new towns are in the process of building the inhabitants are free from many of the traditions of the older places. The new comers who settle in the place are younger, more open to new ideas and ready to enter into the spirit of CO-OPERATION.

TEUTON ALLIES LOSE 100,000 IN BUKOWINA

Petrograd—According to a message from Kiev, the number of prisoners taken by the Russians in the last three weeks' fighting is much greater than was supposed fro mthe official reports.

A party of 2,200 has just reached Kiev. It is said there are 10,000 more in the rear of the fighting line. This number is exclusive of the wounded, whom the Germans are said to be abandoning wholesale.

Prisoners declare that the Austro-Germans have lost 100,000 wounded in Bukowina. Germans transferred from the French front say the fighting there cannot compare with the Titanic frenzy of the struggle on the 170-mile front between Czernowitz and Czartorysk.

Details of the fight for Khriask, north of Czartorysk, indicate the stubbornness of the opposition which the Russians have to overcome.

Having crossed the Sytr seized the village the Russians have to overcome.

Having crossed the Styr and seized the village the Russians began to entrench in the outskirts. Dense masses of the Teutons appeared on the heights, a mile from the village, and, though deluged with shrapnel, stream ed down to the Ipain and vanished in a gully, where they recovered their breath.

As soon as they emerged they were met with a withering fire from the Russian machine guns and rifles, which swept them off their feet in sheaves and sent the remnants flying back to theg ully.

Four further attempts were made to advance, and then a Russian bayonet charge cleared the gully and the Austro-Germans gave upthe attempts to regain their lost position.

BRITISH AND FRENCH CAMPS HIT BY AEROS

London—German aeroplanes have again bombarded Saloniki. This time they inflicted great damage in the camps of the French and English forces.

A squadron of twelve airships shot out from the German positions in the neighborhood of Strumitza, according to a Reuter Sofia dispatch dated Monday.

The invaders dropped no less than seventyeight bombs on Saloniki, devoting special attention to the allies. Their marksmanship was generally accurate, twenty hits being scored. Several of these caused outbreaks of fire.

The attack was so sudden that it came in the nature of a surprise, and the allied airships did not arise in time to repel thei nvaders.

Two of the German aeroplan men, however, were brought down by the allies' anti-aircrafe guns. The rest of the squadroon returned to their headquarters in safety.

LANDERS MADE THE BIG PLAY

Oswego Lad Able to Deliver Eye Openers to Local Talent—Audience Given Much for Little.

A crowd of 250 basketball fans enjoyed a series of three games ob basketball last night in Church's hall, in which 57 varieties of the court game were displayed by the six teams participating. The Maccabee-Oswego Normal game, however, the main event of the evening was the best exhibition presented on the local court this year. Excitement ran 'high throughout the game, due to the seesawing of the score. Half a dozen times throughout the forty minute session the lead switched from one team to the other, and up to the last minute of play the winning team was an undicided issue. Landers, the hoodoo of local ball tossers, performed the essential in the last minute of play, when with the score tied at 28 all, he heaved a throw from the center of the court and scored the winning tally, making the final result 30-28 in favor of the visitors.

Inability to make good a number of throws from the foul line assisted in the defeat of the local quintet. On the other hand, Landers made good 10 out of 13 attempts and thereby won the game. The team work of the Maccabees far surpassed that of the Normal five, and the home outfit scored more baskets from the field. Aside from Landers who scored seven of the field baskets for the visitors, ther est of his team was practically out of the running in so far as dropping the ball into the net was concerned. Frawley and Kany, the two forwards being able to score but one basket each. The guards on the Oswego team confined all of their efforts to preventing scores by the Maccabees and failed themselves to score. Notwithstanding their close guarding, O'Brien scored his usual run, making five field goals, and Ives found the basket for three shots.

Enthusiasm ran so high among the spectators at times that Referee Morin was obliged to call fouls on the home team for interference from the side lines on the part of the Maccabee supporters.

The first point was made by the Oswego team on a foul, which Crockett followed up with a basket from the field. Landers brought his team into the lead by scoring his first basket from the field, after which the deal seesawed back and forth. In the last five minutes of play, with the Oswego team five points in the lead, the Maccabee quintet took a sudden spurt and tied up the Oswegians. A basket from the field by O'Brien placed the local team in the lead, but Landers repeated past performances and closed the game with two neat baskets which gave his team the game.

The two preliminary games were at times amusing and were bothonesided. In the first match, the Holy Name team outclassed the St. Paul Alumni and won out by a score of 21-8. McDonald and Daily of the latter team were the particular stars of their outfit, while Frawley, Martin and Hopkins proved to be theb est indvidual players on the Holy Name team.

The second preliminary proved to be a walkaway for the Boy Scouts who rolled up 52 points against the Tiger's 18.

The lineup in the main event was:

| Maccabees | | Normal |
|---|---|---|
| Ives | Left Forward | Frawley |
| O'Brien | Right Forward | Kany |
| Crockett | Center | Landers |
| Snow | Left guard | Hopkins |
| Ward-Rohrball | Right guard | Myers |

A return game with the Normal team is slated for February 4th when the Maccabees will journey to Oswego to meet the school team on their court.

SUCCESS OF SYMPHONY SOCIETY IS ASSURED

More than two dozen musicians, ten of whom were violinists, and all of them rated as the best musical talent of Fulton, attended the first rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Mr. F. Jess Newton. The rehearsal was held in O. U. A. M. hall, last Sunday, and it afforded proof of the interest taken by lovers of good music in the welfare of the new organization.

"TRAIL HITTERS" DRAW THRONG OF PEOPLE TO CHURCH

The Presbyterian church was filled last night with people interested in hearing the message of the "trail hitters." The delegation included Prof. Hugh Tilroe, Attorney Harley Grand and T. H. Hughes, machinist, all of Syracuse and George W. Pratt of this city. These speakers ocupied the rostrum with Rev. C. S. Robertson, Rev. H. D. Holmes and Rev. J. W. Barrett.

The meeting opened with the singing of old hymns, led by the Rev. H. D. Holmes, and assisted by a choir of mixed voices.

Rev. J. W. Barrett led in the opening prayer.

Attorney Grand in giving his testimony spoke in a simple, explanatory way of his change from a luke-warm Christian to that of a helper, and the satisfaction experienced in the change. He stated that if all people made it their business to work for Jesus with the same fervor that men work for their political friends a great change would be found in the world in a short time. The attitude of the average person leading a Christian life is to be niggardly about the good. "We have so much to be thankful for that it should be easier for us to pass the good on than to keep it to ourselves," was Mr. Grand's expressions.

The next speaker to offer testimony was T. H. Hughes. Mr. Hughes stated that after listening the second time to Billy Sunday's interpretation of God he was cured of an appetite for alcoholic drink and tobacco. He drew vivid pictures of his life during the twelve years he had been a "boozer" and of the futile efforts of his mother and wife to change him. His expressions of joy in finding himself a new man held the ring of sincerity.

Prof. Hugh Tilroe gave his expression of gratitude for the finding of an opportunity in a richer fuller manhood. Prof. Tilroe, who is leader of the Syracuse University band and also had charge of training the Billy Sunday chorus, sang two solos in a most effective manner.

One of the last speakers on the evening's program was George W. Pratt, of this city. Mr. Pratt's direct, straightforward manner in offering his testimony was a pleasure to the entire assemblage. Mr. Pratt expressed the belief that if more men and women were intent on being about the Father's business, that of lifting others to higher, better things, this world would be a more joyful place in which to live. He expressed sorrow that so few people in this city are mindful of the importance of taking a stand for Christianity, and urged all to join in the pleasure of so big a work.

The second of these union services will be held tonight and at the Presbyterian church, at the hour of 7:30 The speakers will include E. L. French of the Crucible Steel Company, W. R. Brown, the man with the message containing the punch, William Masterson and S. B. Groner, secretary of the Syracuse Y. M. C. A.

O. U. A. M. OUTGROWS IT'S PRESENT QUARTERS

At the meeting of the Modern Wodmen of America last night it was announced that a change in the lodge rooms would be made sometime before April 1st and a committee appointed to look up available quarters.

Owing to the recent growth in membership in the order, the lodge has outgrown its present quarters and more room is desired. A building wherein are contained meeting rooms, dance hall, etc., is the choice of the committee. The Tucker building, which is now occupied in part by the Italian Society is the selection of the committee and it is likely that this place will house the lodge in the future.

Officers were installed and a report of the dance committee was also made. Extensive preparations are being made by the committee to have the affair, which is to be given in the O. U. A. M. hall next Thursday night, a huge success. An eight-piece orchestra will furnish the music.

LOUIS LaVECK WANTS BULLDOG KILLED

In City Court this morning, Louis LaVeck made application to Judge Wilson for an order directing the killing of a bulldog belonging to E. E. Fataccio.

George M. Fanning represented plaintiff and H. L. Gilman, the defendant, and witneses on behalf of Mr. LaVeck testified to the dog's viciousness at different times.

Mr. LaVeck's daughter was bitten by the dog while she was passing through Erie st. on December 11th.

WEATHER FORECAST

Snow tonight and much colder. Snow tomorrow followed by cold wave.

ODD FELLOWS' OFFICERS TO BE INSTALLED

District Deputy W. D. Thompson and staff, of Phoenix, will have charge of the installation of officers which will take place at next week's meeting of Neahtawanta lodge, I. O. O. F.

At last night's meeting a report was made by the committee on dinner, and it was decided the affair was a success in every way.

Entertainments of a similar nature are planned for the winter months, to which the public will be invited.

TWO VALUABLE INSTITUTIONS

Utica is fortunate in having such sound and substantial savings-loan institutions as the Homestead Aid Association and the Corn Hill Building and Loan Association, which held their annual meetings last night. The former, the older of the two, distributed more than a million dollars among its shareholders last year, while the latter celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary by a proportionate division of profits. The reports of the officers showed that both associations are in excellent condition.

While these official reports are both interesting and valuable, they do not disclose the extent of the influence of either association for the upbuilding of the city. Few of the city's institutions have contributed in an equal degree to its growth and prosperity.

The Utica associations are acknowledged to be models of successful and economical management, due to the fact that men of affairs have given their time and service to the work as a matter of public spirit.—Utica Dispatch.

WAR WHICH BEGETS MILITARY STRENGTH

It is a mistake to assume that a long and exhausting war really exhausts a nation. The American states men who are urging against preparedness for the reason that after peace is made in Europe no nation will be in shape to prosecute another war are ignoring the teachings of the history of their own country.

When our own Civil War was ended we had same great generals and a large body of veteran soldiers. The attempt to set up a monarchy in Mexico with an Austrian prince as emperor had been made while we were busy with our own troubles. The peace of Appomattox left us free to demand that Maximilian be withdrawn from Mexico, along with the French soldiers who were trying to set him on a throne. Our ability to back that demand by an army under the command of General Grant compelled France to abandon her adventure.

Likewise, the same state of military preparedness was influential in London when we demanded reparation for the damage wrought to our commerce by the Alabama. We spoke as a strong man armed in both cases, and we secured reparation from England and we compelled Europe to respect the Monroe Doctrine when it was asserted for the protection of Mexico. We were not so completely exhausted by four years of fighting that other nations thought we were unable to enforce our demands—Philadelphia Ledger.

CONTINUED PROSPERITY EXPECTED

It is an ill wind that brings benefit in no quarter. Europe's desolating war and its demands, with the addition of our record-breaking crops, have brought unexampled prosperity to many lines of industry in the United States, and our entire people have indirectly benefited, a general tendency among employers to increase wages and salaries having been reported. The question now often asked is whether the continuation of such prosperity or anything like it can be hoped for after the war ends. It has been answered that Europe's great need of food and a variety of supplies will inevitably continue long after the great task of healing the war's scars has been begun.

However that may be an era of new prosperity for the United States is promised altogether apart from trade with Europe. The buying nations of Latin America have been compelled by the conditions in Europe to turn to the United States, and the closer relations in sentiment involved in the welcomed new Pan-American idea can not fail to stimulate and develop closer commercial relations. Returning peace in Mexico will secure a profitable nearby market, and it only remains for American manufacturers and exporters to follow up the advantages offered by South America's need and the good feeling now established. Ship-owning companies will no doubt supply the increased number of carrying vessels as they are required. Our ever expanding home markets will also contribute largely to a continuation of prosperity. Industrially the outlook for the United States is in every way promising.

SCHOOL LUNCHES IN DISTRICTS

It is well known that this section of thec ountry is backward in the mat of providing lunches for public school pupils, therefore the announce ment madeb y the Watertown Times is of interest. The Times says:

District No. 1 in Clare is deserving of especial comment. Here is a school that is serving warm lunches to its pupils.

This school is serving warm lunches, chiefly some sort of soup. This is perhaps, one of theb est articles of diet for the children and is especially palatable at this season of the year. The table dishes are kept upon an artistic stand constructed by the pupils, the legs being small limbs cut from some nearby tree with the bark still upon them. These dishes are, of course, kept covered, while the tinware is hung housewfiely in the hall.

Clare is 'way up in the Adirondack county. Inly a short time ago it was considered the jumping off place just north of the South Woods. But today it has a school that has advanced along th elines which the federal bureau of education has agitated of late. Warm lunches for school children. Shades of their St. Lawrence county fathers and grandfathers. Remember what a scrabble there was around the big box stove in the school room a generation or two back to get a place up next to the fire just to thaw out the noontirde lunch? In those days the teacher made the pupils hang their dinner pails out in the "entry" because they "smelled" in the school room, and during zero weather the boiled eggs were frozen hard, the bread was solid as a board and the cake, if there chanced to be any, was as hard s the bread.

It's a wonder that the children lived through it all, but they did and they were strong and vigorous, apparently. Perhaps there are many grownups today who are suffering from this and that ailment who might have been different if the lunch in the country school house had been warm. In any event, it is very proper to give it a trial, and the step marks development. It is more than a health wrinkle and its adoption 'way up in the town of Clare means that the spirit of progress is moving mightly in the year of grace, 1916.

CATTLE OWNERS ARE WARNED

Washington —Specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture are urging cattle owners, in the North as well as in the South to take steps to rid their cattle of ox warbles or "wolves," the importance of which to the cattle industry has been generally underestimated. Ox warbles are the whitish grubs or maggots which develop from the eggs deposited by certain flies known as warble fliets or heel flies and which injure the hides, reduce milk flow and retard the growth of the animals. The maggots are commonly found just below the skin on the backs of cattle, in the spring. Their presence is revealed by local swellings about the size of pigeons' eggs, each with a small central hole or perforation through which the maggot breaths. From this hole the maggot, when mature, emerges to enter the ground and change to the adult of fly stage. When full grown the grub is about three-fourths of an inch in length.

Pest More Serious

In thep ast trouble from the warbles has largely been confined to cattle in the South, but recently the bureau of Entomology has discovered that a second species, heretofore not found in this country but known to be even a more serious pest, in Europe, than in our native warble, has become well established in certain districts in the northern part of the United States. While it is probable that this so-called European ov warble will not be of as great importance in the Souther part of the United States as the species already established, there is every reason to believe that unless checked itw ill be come generally distributed throughout the northern half of the country. This European species is now generally distributed throughout New York and the New England States, and a few specimens have been obtained from western Pennsylvania, western Maryland, southern Michigan, eastern Iowa and Missouri and western Washington. Attention is also directed to the fact that this species is nod generally distributed throughout southern Canada. The department, therefore, is calling attention at this time to the danger of spreading this species promiscuously about the country and is urging cattle owners to take the simple means necessary to prevent its spread.

Damage Rone by Warbles

Until recently warbles were not regarded as serious even in the South because it was thought that the losses they occasioned came principally from the damage they did to hides. Fven this loss in the aggregate, however, is important, as hides show warble holes three to six months in the year and dealers pay from 50 cents to $1.50 less for hides that show even moderate warble infestation. In many cases the scars left after the

DOMINANT CAUSES OF PRESENT STRUGGLE

"Some wars are known by the great leaders of those wars, and some wars are known by the duration of time which they existed, but the present war is generally conceded to be 'The Great War.'" Thus spoke Dr. Arthur E. Bestor of Chicago last Monday evening before the Colgate student body, in a summary of the causes and dominant characters in this war. Dr. Bestor said that there were at present 950,000,000 people living under thirteen nations engaged in struggle. Never before were so many men under arms; ten million being the number actually engaged. The British have lost 370,000 on the French frontier and 100,000 in the Dardanelles.

Many people thought that the financiers could stop a war, because their countries could not finance a war. Others thought that the common people could stop a war by striking, thus paralizing their country. But at present we are the only great nation which has not become entangled in the present turmoil.

Each nation entered the war with a purpose. Austria believed that she was punishing the Serbians. She was also afraid that the Balkans would get beyond her power. Russia, the great slav leader of the world, believed that she had a mission to perform as an overseer of all the slavs. She also desired as a prize, not German Poland, but Constantinople. Germany hated the English and feared the Russians. The Germans also believed they had a mission in their central position in Europe. With no natural boundary, surrounded by jealous enemies, Germany for years kept peace in Europe. When she became a nation, in 1870, she found all the desirable territories of the world taken by some other power. A German could go to no part of the world and take the flag of his Fatherland with him. France torn with internal strife, England with a possible revolt of India and Ireland on her hands, Egypt ready to burst into a revolution, all this presented an alluring picture to the Germans. France did not want war. Believing that as soon as the Germans conquered Russia she would be the next victim, she unwillingly began hostilities. Belgium, the tragedy of the war, after receiving the ultimatum from Germany, refused to submit to Germany's demands and was forced to enter. Great Britain also feared Germany. Britain knew that once she lost supreme power over all her possessions she was doomed. So the Belgian situation gave her a moral issue upon which to enter. Japan entered, not only because she had a treaty with Britain, but because she desired to retain Russia's friendship and thus keep a control over Manchuria. She also wanted a free hand with China. The Turks, realizing that Constantinople would go to Russia if possible, desired to die with their boots on rather than be murdered in bed. Also their troops had been trained by German officers. Montenegro entered to try and rid herself of Austria. Italy was a member of the triple alliance, but retired from it because Germany was waging an aggressive and not a defensive war. Her people finally forced the king to declare war against Austria. The Bulgarians, a sullen people, were ready at the slightest opportunity to turn against Greece and Serbia, because of the bitter feeling existing after the recent Balkan situation.

These are the main reasons, some of them understanding and some of them or less justifiable, that caused the great war.

PAINTERS OF STATE MEET NEXT WEEK

Utica—The New York State Association of Master House Painters and Decorators will hold its thirty-first annual convention in this city on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of next week. It is expected that about 300 delegates, with their wives, will attend. Bagg's Hotel will be the headquarters of the convention and the business sessions will be held in the Supervisors chambers in the County Court House.

The Change of a Word.

"You wouldn't think there'd be enough difference between the definite and the indefinite article to matter much, would you?" said a woman who writes for a living. "I made a lifelong enemy of a woman once just by writing 'the' where I meant 'a.' It was an account of her wedding I was doing. I said something about the ceremony being performed at the home of the bride's aunt, and then I added that there were present 'only the few friends of the family.' The bride never got over that 'the' in front of few. It happened five years ago, and when my name is mentioned she still froths at the mouth."—Washington Post.

How He Wrote His Name.

Quill pens were made in the fifth century. There is no record of their earlier use. Theodoric, the Ostrogoth king, is said to have been illiterate and unable to write his own name. A golden plate was made with the letters of his name cut through it. This was placed over the document he was expected to sign, and he traced his name through the open spaces with a quill.

BARNETT-QUIRK CASE ON TRIAL

A sealed verdict for the plaintiff for $48.25 was returned yesterday by a jury in the action of D. S. Stone vs. Joseph and Flora Schneider, to recover commissions on the sale and purchase of real estate. The jury was out until 1:30 o'clock, at which time an agreement was reached after seven hours of deliberation. The verdict carries interest, if any is due, It was stated that if the interest does not bring the verdict up to $50. Mr Stone will have to pay the costs, amounting to about $80.

Mr. Stone sued to recover about $90, which he alleged to be due for commissions on the sale of a house in the city and the purchase of the Fralick farm in the country. The defendants claim that they purchased the farm themselves on a mortgage foreclosure and that Mr. Stone did not represent them on that deal. Mr. Tierman, attorney for the defendent, produced a record to show that his client had offered Mr. Stone $42.50 as commission on the sale of the house. The additional $5,75 is the cost of appraising for a loan.

Justice Hubbs ordered a verdict for the plaintiff of $150 in the action of the New York Central Railroad company vs. Hessler Foundry and Manufacturing company. The action was brought to recover for defendants share in the cost of building a switch track to the foundry. The trial occupied a very brief time.

Suit on Theater Contract

Trial of the action of Robert M. Barnett vs. Edward Quirk of Fulton, to recover for an alleged unpaid balance of $1,144.73 on a carpenter contract for the construction of the Quirk Theatre in Fulton in 1912, was started this morning.

Mr. Barnett's contract was for about $11,000 and the papers show that $9,800 was paid thereon. Mr. Quirk claims that certain work was not astisfactorily done. Each side will swear a number of witnesses. G. W. Davis, is attorney with N. S. Bentley as counsel for Mr. Barnett, and Piper and Pendergast appear for Mr. Quirk.

Justice Hubbs insists that attorneys must be ready to try their cases when called, and in following this rule yesterday dismissed the following actions.

C. W. Snow vs. Lory B. Stewart, and Nellie B. Stewart, action on promissory note.

Henry Dyette vs. Joseph Dyette, et al., action to set aside transfer of real estate.

Benjamin Looker vs. Elmer Taylor, negligence, recovery of money damages.

Inquests were held in the following cases:

Fred Pierce Sand & Gravel Co., vs. J. A. Culkin, $81.03 for plaintiff.

Edward Quirk vs. J. A. Culkin, et. ano., $123.59 for plaintiff.

The jury in the case of Clarence G. and Otho G. Dorsey vs. James M. Hart returned a verdict for $270.15 for the plaintiffs in Supreme Court late yesterday afternoon. The jury was out five hours. The verdict was for $300, the full amount claimed, less $29.15, a counted claim by Mr. Hart against the plaintiffs. The verdict carries interest from September 20, 1915.

The action grows out of a contract for the digging of a well on Mr. Hart's farm at Silver Lake. The Dorsey brothers, colored, claim to have been hired by Mr. Hart to dig the well and say he declined to pay them when it was finished. Mr. Hart's defense was that the work was incomplete and the well diggers failed to complete their contract.

Mr. Hart will probably take an appeal. A. T. Jennings of Fulton is attorney for the plaintiffs.

Fielding at Lisbon.

Lisbon contains the grave of Henry Fielding. It was on Oct. 4, 1754, that Fielding died in the Portuguese capital, and it was in 1830 that his tomb was erected in the English cemetery. And Fielding didn't like Lisbon. "As the houses, convents, churches, etc., are large," he wrote, "and all built with white stone, they look beautiful at a distance, but as you approach nearer and find them to want every kind of ornament all idea of beauty vanishes at once." At that time a voyage to Lisbon was an undertaking not lightly to be contemplated. It took Fielding exactly fifty days of foul weather.—St. James' Gazette.

Vegetable Leather.

A plant grows in Japan which furnishes a sort of vegetable leather. It is a pretty shrub called the "mitsumata," and its inner bark, after going through certain processes, is converted into a substance as tough as French kid, so translucent that one can almost see through it and as pliable and soft as calfskin.

Mr. Fred Loddington and family have moved to Oswego. Jay Arnold will occupy their residence.

A Curious Echo.

Among the most noted echoes is that heard from the suspension bridge across the Menai strait. The sound of a blow from a hammer on one of the main piers of the structure is returned in succession from each of the crossbeams that support the roadway and from the opposite pier at the distance of 576 feet, in addition to which the sound is many times repeated between the water and the roadway at the rate of twenty-eight times in five seconds.

Cute Little Girl.

One day while Katherine's mother was ill a cup of beef tea was prepared for her, but Katherine fancied it and drank almost all of it. Her father was about to scold her when her mother said:

"Never mind; it does me just as much good to see her drink it."

Shortly after this a dose of castor oil was prepared for Katherine, and she poured it into her doll's mouth.

"Why, Katherine," said her astonished mother, "what did you do that for?"

"That's all right," Katherine replied, "it will do me just as much good if she drinks it."—Boston Herald

COLLECT TAXES IN WARM MONTH

Mayor Lewis is not alone in the belief that the city should designate a month other than January of each year for the collection of taxes. This opinion is shared by many taxpayers and by many former and present city employes, everybody realizing that a midwinter month imposes upon people burdens enough, by reason of interest coming due on mortgages, coal to buy and other items entering into the cost of living.

Mayor Lewis expressed himself in favor of a change at the last meeting of the Council and his intimate friends know that he does not propose to give up the idea of making a change, to one of the mid-summer months, when the average person is harrassed less by household and other expenses. That the change would be welcomed by hundreds of women and men who own small homes, is evidenced by the expressions one hears on the streets.

FEDERAL AGENTS TAKE UP CANADIAN'S COIL

Watertown—If the story told by Philip Lancto, the French Canadian who alleges that he was imported into this country to work for the St. Regis Paper company at Deferiet, is true his desire to go back to his family at Donnacona, P. Q., will be gratified. While he may suffer the humiliation of remaining in jail for a time hew ill eventually be deported as the immigration authorities have taken up his case. In addition to this if the paper company is found guilty of the alleged charge made against them by Lancto, they will be liable to a fine of $1,000 for violation of the contract labor law, which prohibits importing aliens into this country to work.

COLUMBIA CIRCLE TO GO ON PICNIC SUPPER

The ladies of the Columbia Circle will go on a picnic supper tomorrow afternoon, but not into the woods by the side of the river, as weather conditions may be somewhat unfavorable for an outing. They will instead go to the home of Mrs. Nettie Ottman, in Utica st., taking with them baskets of eatables to be enjoyed when the time arrives for eating.

WOMAN WRITES SCOUT SONG

An Auburn woman, Mrs. Sarah N. Decker, has written a song for the Boy Scouts, which according to the Adv.-Journal runs as follws:

'Tis a goodly pleasant land
That we're living in today,
And our nation is at peace with all the world;
Education free is ours
In this land of wealth and flowers,
And above us Freedom's banner is unfurled.

First Chorus:
Here we find the manly Boy Scouts bleting all the glorious land;
From Atlantic's dashing tide
To Pacific deep and wide,
They are marshalled and for loyalty they stand.

Shining forth in bright array,
Blessings bright have we today,
And to those who come across the rolling sea,
Our fair Goddess stands today
With out-reaching hand to say,
Here is refuge, here is peace and liberty.

Repeat first chorus.

Best of all the words of gold
In our Bible schools are told,
Pointing to the realm of light beyond the sky;
May we gladly think and sing
Of that kingdom and its King,—
Be prepared to make that best of lands on high!

Bright and happy homes have we
From the sea to rolling sea—
O'er the land are found the Boy Scouts in their prime:
This their motto day by day:
"Some good turn along the way,"
Helping others first and last and all the time!

Second Chorus:
On, on, on the Scouts are marching north and south and east and west,
And our slogan this shall be:
"Stars and Stripes the flag for me,
And America the land I love the best!"

No more brave and manly deed
Than to fill a worthy need,
As the rugged steeps of life we nobly climb;
And our daily tribute bring
True allegiance to the King,
Who is the Universal Master all the Time.

Repeat second chorus.

Lift your eyes and see us now
As we hike along the way,
Sing this our song of gladness and good cheer!
In the golden days of youth,
Standing firmly for the truth,
Bravely standing for the right without a fear.

Repeat second chorus.

You may see us by and by
For a seat in Congres stry,
We aspirt to a revered and honored name;
A-m-e-r-i-c-a,
Boy Scouts of the U. S. A.,
And we think that we shall get there just the same!

HILDA SPONG APPEARS TODAY IN "DIVORCED"

The Equitable's five-part society drama "Divorced", which is to be shown at the Quirk Theater today, presents Hilda Spong, England's most celebrated emotional actress, in a play by Edwin Archer which gives full scope to her remarkable talents, and results in a series of heatrt-stirring pictures. The story shows how a stage charmer, by winning a susceptible and rather weak man, breaks up a home, leaves a wife exposed to the machinations and wiles of an unscrupulous society roue, almost wrecks the life of a college boy, leads up to a murder and a thrilling court scene, with a reconciliation between mother and son, and a happy love scene, with ending. A feature of the presentation is the fact that the big wedding picture is the first scene ever taken for a motion picture in a real church. A house of worship in the Bronx of New York was used for this scene, with the regular organist of the church and the sexton in attendance. A Pathe Weekly will also be shown.

FIRST CONSIDERATION

We must prepare for the advent. Let us adopt Wesley's words as our guide. Wesley said:

"Do all the good you can
By all the means you can
In all the ways you can
To all the people you can
As long as ever you can"

The welfare of nearly 12,000 persons depends upon following Wesley's advice. Whatever you do for Fulton you are doing for the greatest number of neighbors.

1916 Is Baby Year

The facts about American babies, the needs of American babies and America's responsibility to her babies will this year be known as never before, because the first week in March will be baby week throughout the country.

More than 400 communities, representing every state in the Union, are already laying their plans for baby week, according to the children's bureau of the United States department of labor, in order that during those seven days the needs of the babies may be so presented that all the parents in those communities will learn a little better how to care for their babies and all the citizens will realize that they have a special obligation to safeguard the conditions surrounding babies. It is confidently believed by those who are interested in this nation wide baby week that the remainder of the year will be marked by a strengthening of all community activities for saving babies' lives and giving them a better chance to grow to a healthy maturity.

The baby week idea originated in Chicago not quite two years ago. Then New York had a baby week and Pittsburgh and other cities. Such practical benefit has in each case resulted that the General Federation of Women's Clubs has undertaken to promote this nation wide observance. State health officials and national organizations interested in public health and child welfare have taken up the plan and in various ways are giving it not only their sanction, but their active cooperation. The extension divisions of the state universities have promised special assistance in interesting and helping baby week in rural communities.

Baby week will give more parents a chance to learn the accepted principles of infant care and will awaken every American to his responsibility for the deaths of the 300,000 babies who, according to the census estimates, die every year before they are twelve months old.

FOR THE TODDLER.

With Its Bolero, This Small Gown Is Smart as Anything.

Cut of white broadcloth on boxy lines, this small gown for the small girl is modish with hand embroidery done in pale blue worsteds. The belt cuffs and bolero are of pale blue broadcloth, and ruches finish the flat collar and cuffs.

For Contagions.

It is important that the mother or nurse who is attending a child ill with a contagious disease should take a walk in the fresh air every day. The best way to arrange this is for her to keep a change of clothing in the next room. She should also bathe before leaving the quarantined room. If a bathroom has been set aside for quarantine she can use this; if not, a screen and a basin in the sickroom will have to answer. Then she can slip into the next room and put on fresh clothing.

She should leave the house by the back way preferably or, at any rate avoid coming in contact with any of the occupants of the house. Once in the street she should not use the street cars nor enter any other house and avoid as much as possible touching any one.

The fumigation of a sickroom after a contagious disease is done by the board of health upon request in most cities, or it can be done by the family under directions of the physician.

Eskimo Sets.

For the littlest boy on his wintry rambles there come the comfiest brushed wool and knit sets that incase him from head to toe in frostproof armor. They consist of a little round cap topped with a pompon of wool or a woolen tassel or even a bit of fur, a close buttoned sweater, long tights and leggings combined and a pair of mittens or woolen gloves. The young hopeful rigged up in these garments looks like a very small cinnamon bear or a snow man, according to the color chosen.

Chestnut Dressing.

Boil a quart of shelled chestnuts in salted water until tender. While warm mash to a paste, adding a teaspoonful of salt, a dash of paprika and half the quantity of breadcrumbs, two tablespoonfuls of melted butter and a teaspoonful of poultry dressing. Blend the ingredients thoroughly, and if a moist dressing is required add a cupful of boiling milk.

Stylish Winter Coat and Velvet Hat

Designed by Best & Co., New York.

THIS smart, dressy separate coat is copied from a Paris model. It is full length of dark brown novelty wool. The fitted waist line is finished with several rows of stitching. Stitching also continues down the side where the coat fastens. The large, new collar is trimmed with a set-in piece of natural beaver. The velvet hat is one of the new shapes that are always becoming. Tinsel fringe ornaments finished in the center with black ribbon bows help to brighten the hat and trim the crown. Both the coat and hat are also appropriate in plum or dark green. ANNA MAY.

The KITCHEN CUPBOARD

THE FISH COURSE.

FISH BAKED WITH CLAMS.—Use large or small fish, cod or haddock, according to size of family—a three pound fish for a family of four. Open fish to back, leaving back whole; spread one-half with raw clams, either a pint or a quart, just as you wish; lay the other half over and tie with several strips of cotton cloth; make four or five little slits in top and press in thin slices of fat salt pork and sprinkle a little flour over all. Bake an hour and serve with melted butter.

Finnan Haddie, Garcia.—Cut half a green pepper in fine, short shreds. Add one tablespoonful of finely chopped onion and cook in three tablespoonfuls of butter until softened and slightly yellowed. Add three tablespoonfuls of flour and one and one-fourth teaspoonfuls each of salt and paprika. Stir until blended with the butter. Add one cupful of cream and one-half cupful of milk. Stir until boiling; then add one pint of cooked finnan haddie and let stand over boiling water till hot.

Boiled Cod.—Clean and prepare fish, tie in piece of cheesecloth and plunge into boiling water. Cook twenty minutes to pound. Be sure that it boils continuously; lift to large hot plate to drain; let stand for four minutes in a hot place; take from cloth, dish on hot platter, pour sauce over fish and serve.

Egg Sauce.—A cupful of milk, one-half cupful of fish liquor, three teaspoonfuls of butter, three tablespoonfuls of flour, seasoning and hard boiled egg. Blend butter and flour, add milk and broth, cook five minutes, add seasoning and cut egg in thin slices, lay on top of fish, pour over the dressing, garnish with parsley. Egg may be chopped instead of sliced for sauce.

Baked Finnan Haddie.—Place fish on waxed paper in baking pan and bake in moderate oven fifteen to twenty minutes or until well heated. Remove backbone and season with little butter. It is very delicate and easy to prepare. The waxed paper prevents sticking.

Creamed Finnan Haddie.—Cut fish into serving portions and place in baking pan on top of stove, nearly cover with water and boil gently until bones can be removed. Drain and pour milk (heated), in which put butter and pepper, over fish and serve.

"TO THE VILE DUST"

VANHEIMERT had been in many duststorms, but never in such a storm so far from the haunts of men. Awaking in his blanket, with his mouth full o. sand, he had opened his eyes to the blinding sting of a storm which already shrouded the very tree under which he lay. Other landmarks there were none The world was swallowed in a yellow swirl that turned browner and more opaque even as Vanheimert shook himself out of his blanket and ran for the fence as for his life. He had only left it in order to camp where his tree ha towered against the stars. It could not be a hundred yards away, and along the fence ran that beaten track to which the bushman turned instinctively in his panic. In a few seconds h. was groping with outstretched hand. to break the violence of a collision with invisible wires. In a few minutes standing at a loss, wondering where the wires or he had got to and whether it would not be wise to retrace his steps and try again. And while he wondered a fit of coughing drove th dust from his mouth like smoke, an even as he coughed the thickening swirl obliterated his tracks as swiftly as heavy snow.

Speckled eyeballs stood out of a sanded face as Vanheimert saw himself adrift and drowning in the dust. It was a huge young fellow, and it was a great smooth face, from which the gaping mouth cut a slit from jaw to jaw Terror and rage and an overpowering passion of self pity convulsed th coarse features in turn; then, with th grunt of a wounded beast, he rallie and plunged to his destruction, deeper and deeper into the bush, farther an farther from the fence.

The trees were few and mostly stunted, but Vanheimert crashed into more than one upon his headlong course The sense was choked out of him already. He was tossing on the wind of the storm, of direction he though no more. He forgot that the run h had been traversing was at the be abandoned by man and beast. He forgot the "spell" that he had promised himself at the deserted homestead where he had once worked as a lad He might have remembered that the paddock in which he was burying himself had always been the largest in the district. It was a ten mile block without subdividing fence or drop o water from end to end. The whole station was a howling desert, little likely to be stocked a second time b enlightened man. But this was the desert's beast, and into it sped Vanheimert, coated yellow to the eyes and lips, the dust field himself in visible shape. Now he staggered in his stride, now fell headlong to cough and sob in the hollow of his arm. The unfortunate young man had the courage of his desperate strait. Many times he arose and hurled himself onward with curse or prayer, many times he fell or flung himself back to earth. But at length the storm passed over and over his spent members, sand gathered by the handful in the folds of his clothes, the end was as near as end could be.

It was just then that two riders, who fancied they had heard a voice, struck an undoubted trail before it vanished, and followed it to the great sprawling body in which the dregs of life pulsed feebly. The thing groaned as it was lifted and strapped upon a horse; it gurgled gibberish at the taste of raw spirits later in the same hour It was high noon before Vanheimert opened a seeing eye and blinked it in the unveiled sun.

He was lying on a blanket in a treeless hollow in the midst of trees. The ground had been cleared by no human hand; it was a little basin of barren clay, burnt to a brick and drained by the tiny water hole that sparkled through its thatch of leaves and branches in the center of a natural circle. Vanheimert turned and viewed the sylvan amphitheater; on its far side were two small tents and a man in a folding chair reading the Australasian. He closed the paper on meeting Vanheimert's eyes, went to one of the tents, stood a moment looking in and then came across the sunlit circle with his newspaper and the folded chair

"And how do you feel now?" said he, setting up the chair beside the blanket.

"Fine!" replied Vanheimert huskily. "But where am I, and who are you chaps? Rabbiters?"

As he spoke, however, he searched for the inevitable strings of rabbit skins festooned about the tents and found them not.

"If you like," replied the other, frowning a little at the immediate curiosity of the rescued man.

"I don't like," said Vanheimert, staring unabashed. "I'm a rabbiter my self and know too much. It ain't no game for abandoned stations, and you don't go playin' it in top boots and spurs. Where's your skins and where's your squatter to pay for 'em? Plucky rabbiters, you two!"

And he gazed across the open toward the farther tent, which had just disgorged a long body and a black beard not wholly unfamiliar to Vanheimert.

"Then what should you say that we are?"

"How do I know?" cried Vanheimert turning pale, for he had been one of the audience at Mrs. Clarkson's concert in Gulland's store, and in consecutive moments he had recognized first Howie and now Stingaree.

"You know well enough."

And the terrible eyeglass covered him like a pistol.

"Perhaps I can guess," faltered Vanheimert.

"Guess, then."

"There are tales about a new chum camping by himself that is, just with one man"—

"And what object?"

"To get away from the world, sir."

"And where did you hear these tales?"

"All along the road, sir."

The chastened tone, the anxious countenance, the sudden recourse to the servile monosyllable, were none of them lost on Stingaree, but he himself had once set such a tale abroad, and it might be that the present bearer still believed it. The eyeglass looked him through and through. Vanheimert bore the inspection like a man.

"I suppose you have no recollection of how you got here?" at length said Stingaree.

"Not me. I only remember the dust storm. But I'm very grateful to you, sir, for saving my life."

"You are, are you?"

"Haven't I cause to be, sir?"

"Well, I dare say we did bring you round between us, but it was pure luck that we ever came across you. And now I should lie quiet if I were you. In a few minutes there'll be a pannikin of tea for you, and after that you'll feel a different man."

After he had made the tea Stingaree played his violin for a time.

Vanheimert lay quiet enough; there was much to occupy his mind. Instinctively he had assumed a part, and he was only less quick to embrace the necessity of a strictly consistent performance. He watched Stingaree in close conversation with Howie, who was boiling the billy on a spirit lamp between the two tents, but he watched them with an admirable simulation of idle unconcern. They were talking about him of course, more than once they glanced in his direction, and each time Vanheimert congratulated himself the more heartily on the ready pretense to which he was committed. Let them but dream that he knew them, and Vanheimert gave himself as short a shrift as he would have granted in their place. But they did not dream it; they were off their guard and rather at his mercy than he at theirs. He might prove the immediate instrument of their capture—why not?

It was Howie who came over with the steaming pannikin and watched Vanheimert as he sipped and smacked his lips, while Stingaree at his distance watched them both. The pannikin was accompanied by a tin plate full of cold mutton and a wedge of baking powder bread, which between them prevented the ravening man from observing how closely he was himself observed as he assuaged his pangs. There was, however, something in the nature of a muttered altercation between the bushrangers when Howie was sent back for more of everything. Vanheimert put it down to his own demands and felt that Stingaree was his friend when it was he who brought the fresh supplies.

"Eat away," said Stingaree, seating himself and producing pipe and tobacco. "It's rough fare, but there's plenty of it."

"I won't ask you for no more," replied Vanheimert, paving the way for his escape.

"Oh, yes, you will!" said Stingaree. "You're going to camp with us for the next few days, my friend!"

"Why am I?" cried Vanheimert, aghast at the quiet statement, which it never occurred to him to gainsay.

"Because the way out of this takes some finding, and what's the use of escaping an unpleasant death one day if you go and die it the next? That's one reason," said Stingaree, "but there's another. The reason is that, now you're here, you can't go till I choose."

"That's real kind of you," said Vanheimert. "I don't feel like running no more risks till I'm obliged. My nerves are shook. And, if a born back blocker may make so bold, it's a fair old treat to see a new chum camping out for the fun of it."

"Who told you I was a new chum?" asked Stingaree sharply. "Ah, I remember," he added, nodding; "you heard of me lower down the road."

Vanheimert grinned from ear to ear.

"I'd have known it without that," said he. "What real bushmen would boil their billy on a spirit lamp when there's wood and to spare for a campfire on all sides of 'em?"

Now, Vanheimert clearly perceived the superiority of smokeless spirit lamp to telltale fire for those in hiding, so he chuckled consumedly over this thrust, which was taken in such excellent part by Stingaree as to prove him a victim to the desired illusion. It was the cleverest touch that Vanheimert had yet achieved. And he had the wit neither to blunt his point by rubbing it in nor to call attention to it by subtle protestation of his pretended persuasion. But once or twice before sundown he permitted himself to ask natural questions concerning the old country and to indulge in those genial gibes which the Englishman in the bush learns to expect from the indigenous buffoon.

In the night Vanheimert was less easy. He had to sleep in Howie's tent, but it was some hours before he slept at all, for Howie would remain outside, and Vanheimert longed to hear him snore. At last the rabbiter fell into a doze, and when he awoke the auspicious music filled the tent. He listened on one elbow, peering till the darkness turned less dense, and there lay Howie across the opening of the tent. Vanheimert reached for his thin elastic sided bushman's boots, and his hands trembled as he drew them on. He stepped over Howie's form without mistake, and the ignoble strains droned on behind him.

Before departure Vanheimert wished to peep into the other tent, but its open end was completely covered in for the night, and prudence forbade him to meddle with his hands.

On foot he went, indeed on tiptoe till the edge of the trees was reached without adventure, and he turned to look his last upon the two tents shimmering in the starlight. As he turned again, satisfied that the one was still shut and that Howie still lay across the opening of the other, a firm hand took Vanheimert by either shoulder; otherwise he had leaped into the air, for it was Stingaree, who had stepped from behind a bush as from another planet, so suddenly that Vanheimert nearly gasped his dreadful name.

"I couldn't sleep! I couldn't sleep!" he cried out.

"No more could I," said Stingaree.

"So I was going for a stroll. That was all. I swear, Mr.—Mr.—I don't know your name!"

"Quite sure?" said Stingaree.

"My oath! How should I?"

Stingaree peered into the great face in which the teeth were chattering and from which all trace of color had flown.

"I shouldn't eat you for knowing who I am," said Stingaree. "Honesty is still a wise policy in certain circumstances."

"I know nothing about you, and care less," retorted Vanheimert sullenly, though the perspiration was welling out of him. "I come for a stroll because I couldn't sleep, and I can't see what all this blarney's about."

Stingaree dropped his hands.

"Do you want to sleep?"

"My blessed oath!"

"Then come to my tent, and I'll give you a nobbler that may make you."

The nobbler was poured out of a gallon jar, under Vanheimert's nose, by the light of a candle which he held himself. Yet he smelled it furtively before trying it with his lips and denied himself a gulp till he was reassured. But soon the empty pannikin was held out for more. And it was the starless hour before dawn when Vanheimert tripped over Howie's legs and took a contented header into the corner from which he had made his stealthy escape.

The tent was tropical when he awoke, but Stingaree was still at his breakfast outside in the shade. He pointed to a bucket and a piece of soap behind the tent, and Vanheimert engaged in obedient ablutions before sitting down to his pannikin, his slice of damper and his portion of a tin of sardines.

"Sorry there's no meat for you," said Stingaree. "My mate's gone to Ivanhoe for fresh supplies."

The rabbiter looked at a pair of dilapidated worsted socks and at one protruding toe. He was not sure whether he had gone to bed for the second time in these or in his boots. Certainly he had missed the latter on his second awakening, but had not deemed it expedient to make inquiries. And now he merely observed that he wondered where he could have left them.

"On your feet," said Stingaree. "My mate has made so bold as to borrow them for the day."

"He's welcome to them, I'm sure," said Vanheimert, with a sickly smile.

"I was sure you would say so," rejoined Stingaree. "His own are reduced to uppers and half a heel apiece, but he hopes to get them soled in Ivanhoe while he waits."

"So he's gone to Ivanhoe, has he?"

"He's been gone three hours."

"Surely it's a long trip?"

"Yes. We shall have to make the most of each other till sundown," said Stingaree, gazing through his glass upon Vanheimert's perplexity.

And with a cavalier nod to clinch the last word on the subject the bushranger gave himself over to his camp chair, his pipe and his inexhaustible Australasian. As for Vanheimert, he eventually returned to the tent in which he had spent the night, and there he remained a good many minutes, though it was now the forenoon and the heat under canvas past endurance. But when at length he emerged, as from a bath, Stingaree, seated behind his Australasian in the lee of the other tent, took so little notice of him that Vanheimert crept back to have one more look at the thing which he had found in the old valise which served Howie for a pillow. And the thing was a very workmanlike revolver, with a heavy cartridge in each of its six chambers.

Vanheimert handled it with trembling fingers and packed it afresh in the pocket where it least affected his personal contour, its angles softened by a big bandanna handkerchief, only to take it out yet again with a resolution that opened a fresh sluice in every pore. The blanket that had been lent to him and Howie's blanket both lay at his feet. He threw one over either arm and with the revolver thus effectually concealed, but grasped for action with finger on trigger, sallied forth at last.

Stingaree was still seated in the narrowing shade of his own tent. Vanheimert was within five paces of him before he looked up so very quickly, with such a rapid adjustment of the terrible eyeglass that Vanheimert stood stock still, and the butt of his hidden weapon turned colder than ever in his melting hand.

"Why, what have you got there?" cried Stingaree. "What's the matter with you, man?" he added, as Vanheimert stood shaking in his socks.

"Only his blankets, to camp on," the fellow answered hoarsely. "You advised me to help myself, you know."

"Quite right, so I did; but you're as white as the tent—you tremble like a leaf. What's wrong?"

"My head," replied Vanheimert, in a whine. "It's going round and round, either from what I had in the night or lying too long in the hot tent, or one on top of the other. I thought I'd camp for a bit in the shade."

"I should," said Stingaree, and buried himself in his paper with undisguised contempt.

Vanheimert came a step nearer. Stingaree did not look up again. The revolver was leveled under one trailing blanket. But the trigger was never pulled. Vanheimert feared to miss even at arm's length, so palsied was his hand, so dim his eye. He was a bushranger and an outlaw; he deserved to die or to be taken, and Vanheimert's only regret was that he had neither taken nor shot him at their last interview.

"Come and eat," shouted Stingaree at last, and Vanheimert trailed the blankets over his left arm, his right thrust idly into his pocket, which bulged with a red bandanna handkerchief. "Sorry it's sardines again," the bushranger went on, "but we shall make up with a square feed tonight if my mate gets back by dark; if he doesn't, we may have to tighten our belts till morning. Fortunately there's plenty to drink. Have some whisky in your tea?"

Vanheimert nodded, and with an eye on the bushranger, who was once more stooping over his beloved Australasian, helped himself enormously from the gallon jar.

"And now for a siesta," yawned Stingaree, rising and stretching himself after the meal.

"Hear, hear!" croaked Vanheimert, his great face flushed, his bloodshot eyes on fire.

"I shall camp on the shady side of my tent."

"And I'll do ditto at the other."

"So long, then."

"So long."

"Sweet repose to you!"

"Same to you," rasped Vanheimert, and went off cursing and chuckling in his heart by turns.

Lulled by the faint perpetual murmur of leaf and branch, without a sound from bird or beast to break its soothing monotone, the two men lay down within a few yards, though out of sight of each other. And for a time all was very still.

Then Vanheimert rose slowly, without a sound, and came on tiptoe to the other tent, his right hand in the pocket where the bandanna handkerchief had been but was no longer. He came close up to the sunny side of the tent and listened vainly for a sound. But Stingaree lay like a log in the shade on the far side, his face to the canvas and his straw sombrero tilted over it. And so Vanheimert found him, breathing with the placid regularity of a sleeping child.

Vanheimert looked about him; only the ring of impenetrable trees and the deep blue eye of heaven would see what really happened. But as to what exactly was to happen Vanheimert himself was not clear as he drew the revolver ready cocked; even he shrank from shooting a sleeping man. What he desired and yet feared was a sudden start, a semblance of resistance, a swift justifiable shot. And as his mind's eye measured the dead man at his feet the live man turned slowly over on his back.

It was too much for Vanheimert's nerves. The revolver went off in his hands. But it was only a cap that snapped, and another and another, as he stepped back, firing desperately. Stingaree sat upright, looking his treacherous enemy in the eye. And when the sixth cap snapped as harmlessly as the other five Vanheimert caught the revolver by its barrel to throw or to strike. But the raised arm was seized from behind by Howie, who had crept from the scrub at the snapping of the first cap; at the same moment Stingaree sprang upon him, and in less than a minute Vanheimert lay powerless, grinding his teeth, foaming and bleeding at the mouth.

The bushrangers' action was silent, swift, concerted, prearranged. They lashed their prisoner's wrists together, lashed his elbows to his ribs, hobbled his ankles and tethered him to a tree by the longest and the stoutest of their many ropes. The tree was the one under which Vanheimert had found himself the day before.

"When we came upon you yesterday morning in the storm one of us was for leaving you to die in your tracks," began Stingaree. He was immediately interrupted by his mate.

"That was me!" cried Howie, with a savage satisfaction.

"It doesn't matter which of us it was," continued Stingaree, "the other talked him over. We put you on one of our horses, and we brought you more dead than alive to the place which no other man has seen since we took a fancy to it. We saved your miserable life. I won't say at the risk of our own, but at risk enough even if you had not recognized us. We were going to see you through, whether you knew us or not; before this we should have set you on the road from which you had strayed. I thought you must know us by sight, but when you denied it I saw no reason to disbelieve you. It only dawned on me by degrees that you were lying, though Howie here was sure of it.

"I still couldn't make out your game—if it was funk I could have understood it—so I tried to get you to own up in the night. I let you see that we didn't mind whether you knew us or not, and yet you persisted in your lie. So then I smelled something deeper. But we had gone out of our way to save your life. It never struck me that you might go out of your way to take ours."

"I never meant taking your lives," muttered Vanheimert. "I meant taking you, as you deserved."

"We scarcely deserved it of you. But that is a matter of opinion. As for taking us alive, no doubt you would have preferred to do so if it had seemed equally safe and easy. You had not the pluck to run a single risk. You were given every chance. I sent Howie into the scrub, took the powder out of six cartridges and put what anybody would have taken for a loaded revolver all but into your hand. I sat at your mercy, quite looking forward to the sensation of being stuck up for a change. If you had stuck me up like a man," said Stingaree, "you might have lived to tell the tale.

"You tried to shoot me in my sleep," said Stingaree, speaking slowly, with intense articulation. "That's your gratitude. You will live just long enough to wish that you had shot yourself instead."

Stingaree rose.

"You may as well shoot me now," cried Vanheimert, with a husky effort.

"Shoot you? I'm not going to shoot you at all, shooting's too good for you. But you are to die—make no mistake about that. And soon, but not tonight. That would not be fair to you, for reasons which I leave to your imagination. You will lie where you are tonight, and you will be watched and fed like your superiors in the condemned cell. The only difference is that I can't tell you when it will be. It might be tomorrow—I don't think it will—but you may number your days on the fingers of both hands."

So saying, Stingaree turned on his heel and was lost to sight in the shades of evening before he reached his tent. But Howie remained on duty with the condemned man.

As such Vanheimert was treated from the first hour of his captivity. Not a rough word was said to him. A blanket was permitted him day and night, but night and day he was sedulously watched, and neither knife nor fork was provided with his meals. His fare was relatively not inferior to that of the legally condemned, whose notorious privileges and restrictions served the bushrangers for a model.

And Vanheimert clung to the hope of a reprieve with all the sanguine tenacity of his ill starred class, though it did seem with more encouragement on the whole. For the days went on, and each of many mornings brought its own respite till the next. The welcome announcement was invariably made by Howie after a colloquy with his chief, which Vanheimert had watched with breathless interest for the first day or two, but thereafter with increasing coolness. They were trying to frighten him; they did not mean it, any more than Stingaree had meant to shoot the new chum who had the temerity to put a pistol to his head after the affair of the Glenranald bank. The case of lucky Fergus, justly celebrated throughout the colony, was a great comfort to Vanheimert's mind; he could see but little difference between the two; but if his treachery was the greater so also was the ordeal to which he was being subjected.

"Neither here," said Stingaree. "We're too fond of the camp."

There was an interval of the faint, persistent rustling of branch and leaf, varied by the screech of a distant cockatoo and the nearer cry of a crow, as the dusk deepened into night as expeditiously as off the stage. Vanheimert was not awed by the quiet voice to which he had been listening. It lacked the note of violence which he understood; it even lulled him into a belief that he would still live to tell the tale. But in the dying light he looked up, and in the fierce, unrelenting face, made the more sinister by its foppish furniture, he read his doom.

"Are you going to shoot me before you go?" he cried, "or are you going to leave me to die alone?"

"Neither here," said Stingaree. "We're too fond of the camp."

It was his first brutal speech, but the brutality was too subtle for Vanheimert. He was beginning to feel that something dreadful might happen to him after all. The pinions were removed from his arms and legs, the long rope detached from the tree and made fast to one of Stingaree's stirrups instead. And by it Vanheimert was led a good mile through the scrub, with Howie at his heels.

A red sun had risen on the camp, but in the scrub it ceased to shine, and the first open space was as sunless as the dense bush. Spires of sand kept whirling from earth to sky, joining other spinning spires, forming a monster balloon of yellow sand, a balloon that swelled until it burst, obscuring first the firmament and then the earth. But the mind of Vanheimert was so busy with the fate he feared that he did not realize he was in another duststorm until Stingaree at the end of the rope was swallowed like a tug in a fog. And even then Vanheimert's peculiar terror of a duststorm did not link itself to the fear of sudden death which had at last been put into him. But the moment of mental enlightenment was at hand.

The rope trailed on the ground as Stingaree loomed large and yellow through the storm. He had dropped his end. Vanheimert glanced over his shoulder, and Howie loomed large and yellow behind him.

"You will now perceive the reason for so many days' delay," said Stingaree. "I have been waiting for such a dust storm as the one from which we saved you, to be rewarded as you endeavored to reward me. The chances are perhaps against you and somewhat in favor of a more unpleasant death, but it is quite possible that the storm may pass before it finishes you and that you may then hit the fence before you die of thirst, and at the worst we leave you no worse off than we found you. And that, I hold, is more than you had any right to expect. So long!"

The thickening storm had swallowed man and horse once more. Vanheimert looked round. The second man and the second horse had also vanished. And his own tracks were being obliterated as fast as footmarks in blinding snow.

holes have healed causeb uyers to cut prices considerably.

The loss from thew arble, however, is by no means limited to the holes the maggots cut in the hides. Extensive investigations in Germany and Denmark indicate that the losses through reduction in milk supply in dairy cattle, the retardation of growth in young stock, and the loss of flesh in all classes of animals are twofold greater than the damage done to the hides. In some of these tests the early extraction of the grubs from the backs of infested cattle resulted in an increase of nearly 25 per cent. in the milk production. Animals from which the grubs had been extracted showed a gain of more than five per cent in weight over similar animals in which thep ests were allowed to develop normally.

Methods of Controlling Pest

Thus far the veterinarians and entomologist of the department have determined no better way of controlling these pests than through the systematic extraction and destruction of the grubs from the backs of infested animals.

When the larvae are nearly ready to leave their host they may be easily squeezed out by pressing the swelling with the fingers, but if not so far developed it is often very difficult to get th em out by squeezing. In such cases a slender paid of forceps may be used for pulling them out. If the swelling and its opening are still very small the best way of extracting the grub is to make an incision with a knife, after which theg rub can be squeezed out by aplying strong pressure. Kill the grub when removed.

When to Examine Cattle

It is important that warbles be removed as early in their development as possible. This relieves the infested animals from the irritation and prevents the enlargement of the exist holes. While this practice is not applicable to ranch conditions, it is easily put into effect on small farms and in dairies. In the Southern States the herds should be gone over early in December, and about twice later at monthly intervals. In the Northern States the exraction should be begun six weeks or two months later. If no grubs are allowed to drop to the ground and reach maturity the number appearing in cattle in subsequent years will be materially reduced, and if extraction is followed up for several years almost complete eradication will result. Of course it is important where possible to get concerted action among the stockmen in the destruction of these pests.

In extensive experiments along this line in Germany it was determined that the cost of removing all of the warbles from the backs of cattle during one season was about three cents per head. In this case men were employed especially to do the work. It is possible for practically every farmer and dairyman in this country to accomplish this work without material expense or loss of time.

OSWEGO MAY HAVE SCHOOL SAVINGS BANKS

School savings banks are winning popularity in many cities throughout the country ,and now Oswego officials are thinking about adopting them in the sechools of that city. The Palladium says of the movement:

Savings institutions in the schools are not new. For many years they have been in vogue in many cities and in some they have proved highly satisfactory, awakening and developing a spirit of thrift among the boys and girls that is bound to have an influence for good in after life. The plan is to give the students a bank book, issued by the school. When they have pennies to deposit they take them to the teacher who credits them up in the deposit book of the child and also in the account book of the school. When the sum deposited by each student has reached $1 it is taken and deposited in a savings institution in the name of the child and the deposit book is taken out in the name of and given to the latter, and thus the child becames a bank depositor, with an account which he is urged to augment as the years go by, until such time as it may be desired for another purpose. It is argued by the advocates of the plan that it not only induces thrift, but that also it teaches the sudents something about banks and banking.

Superintendent Richards believes that the plan would work advantageously, but some of the teachers, it is understood, do not fell that they should be encumbered with the responsibility of keeping the accounts and the money.

However, the committee to be named to thrash the matter out will consider many plans that are in vogue in different places and if it is deemed advisable to establish the banks the best and simplest plan will be adopted for the local schools.

There is one thing certain that students will not be permitted to draw out a portion of their funds every time a circus comes to town or a new reel is put on at the movie theater. Such withdrawals might quickly deplete the bank funds.

Transportation and Civilization—

By DR. FRANK CRANE

Copyright, 1915, by Frank Crane

Did you ever think how much CIVILIZATION is a matter of TRANSPORTATION?

People were narrow, barbarous and cruel in olden times, because they hardly ever TRAVELED. They were PROVINCIAL. Hence full of PREJUDICE and IGNORANCE.

The Railway train and the Steamship make men BROADMINDED.

The railroad links your town with the WORLD.

It takes you everywhere. And it brings to you STRANGERS, PAPERS, letters and the best of all creation.

The Railroad needs YOUR THOUGHTFUL CONSIDERATION when questions of policy affecting its interests are discussed with you.

THE above from the pen of Dr. Frank Crane is reproduced in this advertisement with his permission.

In such expressions we note with pleasure a growing confidence between the public and railroads who dedicate their facilities and activities to the Public Service, the motto of the New York Central Lines.

KANSAS HAS LOWEST DEATH RATE IN U. S.

Topeka, Kan.—"Kansas, with a rate of 9.8 in each 1,000 population, has has the lowest death rate of any state in the union, because the people do not dring liquor, because they have money enough to live right and because they have the intelligence to read of thec onditions that make for short lives and know ho wto dodge them."

This is the answer of W. J. Deacon, registrar of the Kansas Vital Statistics Bureau, to Samuel L. Rogers, director of the United States Bureau of the Census. The government official wrote to Mr. Deacon to get an explanation of why the Kansis death rate is so low. In reply Mr. Deacon wrote:

"Kansas is almost wholly an agricultural state; there are only twelve cities in the state of more than 100,000 population, and there is a gratifying absence of slum districts in the cities. Aside from the southeast corner of the state there is no mining.

"The density of the population in the state is only 220.7 persons to the square mile, and 70.8 per cent. of the population reside outside of towns of 2,500 population or more. The climate temperature, is usually mild enough tc permit much outdoor work and open windows:

"But it is to the people themselves that fe must look for those minor and subtle quantities that make for better and longer living."

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

Let us consider the more important things that make for better towns.

1. The first fundamental is HEALTH. Its consideration brings the town face to face with sanitary conditions, the disposal of waste, garbage, sewage, the securing of good water, the ventilation of schoolhouses, and the medical inspection of school children.

2. EDUCATION, has been made almost a fetish in American communities, but it involves so much that any progressive community does not hesitate to lend every influence it can exercise to have a modern school. (How about NOT paying the teachers ON TIME as happens here). The general tone of the community is REFLECTED IN THE SCHOOL; in consequence, the problems of support maintainance, and direction are unusually important.

3. The MORAL atmosphere of the community is the third fundamental. A town is attractive, as a general thing, in accordance with its moral atmosphere. This involves its attitude toward saloons, the tone of the amusements, the enforcement of law, and the part which is played by school and church as moral agents in holding young people to higher ideals. (The saloonkeeper has shown on many occasions that HIS heart is in the right place). The amusements are closely allied with the moral situation, and especially is this true in the smaller communities, which are rarely visited by lecturers, musical organizations or theatrical companies. Mental stimulus and moral outlook are furnished oftentimes by instruction and this problem is one of the most serious the small town has to consider.

4. A further fundamental is BUSINESS. It is the foundation of the town and consequently important. There are always conflicting forces at work against the development of business in a community, seen sometimes in too much competition, in too high prices, IN LACK OF ADVERTISING IN HOME PAPERS or a clear perception of the problems which confront the community. Many villages drift from condition to condition, taking each failure to arrive as an evidence of the hostile attitude of Providence against them. This is the situation that will obtain unless counteracted by the intelligent co-operation of the men of the town with each other. Business conditions generally are changing so rapidly that adherence to old views may leave the town behind in the race for supremacy in the district, unless resort is had to joint action through the medium of ORGANIZATION. Thus far the COMMERCIAL ORGANIZATION has been the best medium for securing opinion and common action.

Besides the features of town organization mentioned thus far in this outline, there are other phases of town life which will be given consideration such as administration and government, including the question of TAXATION, the activities of clubs and organizations, the townhotel and the future of the community. A town is a community of common interests; a town is a SOCIAL ORGAN. The conduct of its AFFAIRS SHOULD BE MARKED BY LOYALTY, INTELLIGENCE, EFFICIENCY, WILLINGNESS TO SPEND MONEY, AND INSISTENCE UPON RESULTS FOR THE VERY REASON THAT IT IS NOT A PRIVATE CONCERN, BUT A SOCIAL ORGANIZATION, INVOLVING THE INTERESTS OF THOUSANDS OF PEOPLE.

A few years ago individualism was rampant. The emphasis was upon competition as the soul of trade, and because of the opposition engendered, pulling TOGETHER WAS NEARLY IMPOSSIBLE. Little by little the municipality has begun to understand that nearly everything is possible WHEN CITIZENS WORK TOGETHER; while the concept of community values, due to the presence of a population in a limited area is breaking slowly upon the minds of men as a means by which the social needs of the community may be financed.

Revival Services Were Brought to Successful Close

The last of the three evangelistic services was held at the Presbyterian church last night. Every seat in the auditorium was taken, chairs were placed in the aisles, the entire standing room in the rear of the room was taken, while the eager crowd over flowed into the Sunday school rooms.

The Rev. C. S .Robertson presided and Messrs. A. N. Ellis, "Spike" Williams, J. A. Griffin and Chas. Hubbles of the Billy Sunday Club of Syracuse were the speakers. Prof. Fred Revels of the University sang two solos. Miss Ruth Allen and Miss Marion Lake were also heard in a vocal selection.

Mr. Ellis was the first speaker and gave an enthusiastic talk on the possibilities in the organization of a Billy Sunday Business Men's club in the community. He told of the accomplishments of the Canastota Business Men's club of which he is a member. One of the broad ways in which thec lub works is shown by the fact that no one is barred from membership. Some of the members of the Canostota club Mr. Ellis stated, are not church members, nor do they attend church regularly. However the work of the club as a whole was described as wholesome and uplifting to the entire community. Mr. Ellis urged that such a club be formed in Fulton.

"Spike" Williams, an ex-covict, in language of his own, made clear a picture to the audience of the change wrought from a life of error to one of understanding. Twenty-eight years of his life were spent behind prison bars. From a little child he had gone thru all the by-ways of the devil's own, yet emerging in the consciousness of his manhood to tell a church assemblage in the phraseology and accent of the underworld's people, "Take it from me dere ain't nuttin' in de game, folks. Now I out fer Jesus, fer what he done fer me is more den all de law and cops could do."

"Spike" left last night for Trenton on a late train carrying with him a letter signed by nearly four hundred Syracuse church members.

Mr. Griffin the next speaker, won the appreciation of his listeners. He simply radiated pleasure in being able to pass along the message of a bigger life. He commented on the trail-hitting during the Sunday campaign in Syracuse as having been productive of results almost miracle like. He showed how the influence of one person led through an entire family and to all their associates and their clansmen too. He read an extract from one of Billy's sermon's on going to heaven; his voice took on pleased little kinks, he hoped he wasn't taking "too muct time," and in leaving with "Spike" to get an early train, he beamed upon those seated on the rostrum, those both seated and standing in the auditorium, not even leaving out the "overflows" in the Sunday school room. He shook all in reach by the head as he went our murmuring, beaming, radiating. Seeing his unfeigned gladnes made clearer to many a one just what the Master meant whe n he said "Except ye become as little children ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven."

Mr. Hubbles the next speaker, confessed to having been previous to the Sunday campaign an atheist. His phrases were well chosen and his description of the day of adversity when coming to the unbeliever, as one of darkest night where God's light shines not, was indeed vivid. He expressed himself now as a happy changed man, and urgently appealed to not only take a stand for God but to work for Him. His testimony was as unusual one and he held the audience in deep interest.

The Rev. C. S. Robertson before dismissing the gathering stated the pleasure of the pastors of the churches in the city over the success of the three-day services. The good accomplished in so short a time was expressed as having been beyond their most saguine hopes when the plans were made.

MAY PROVE BEGINNING OF PEACE

The sudden drive at and capture of Mount Loven is, with the possible exception of the defeat of the Dardanelles expedition the most decisive blow the Teutons have struck.

With Mount Loven in Austrian hands, Italy's dream of Adriatic supremacy vanishes, as the Italian statesmen frankly admit. And with that dream vanishes any real interest Italy has in the further prosecution of her war with Austria.

Trieste and the Trentimo, simply as territories, mean little to Italy. Gabriele d'Annunzio's rhapsodies over them were poetical but they did not express Italian statesmen's policies.

Trentino has been Austrian territory for five hundred years and the Italian speaking population is noted for its deep loyalty to the House of Hapsburg.

The Italian statesmen were not concerned about freeing these Italian-speaking Austrians from Austrian rule. They were concerned about making Italy the mistress of the Adriatic. For this reason they wanted to possess Trieste. But with Mount Lovcen, the Gibraltar of the Adriatic, in Austrian hands, the possession of Trieste as a naval base no longer confers control of the Adriatic Sea.

Thinking men will be apt to suspect that Italy will now manifest a strong predisposition toward peace proposals.—N. Y. American.

TAFT'S JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS

There is an unwritten rule in the Senate of the United States respecting confirmations of nominations for the Supreme Court which requires that the minority party shall have at least three representatives in the highest court, and, as the Democrats had but three representatives and the Republicans six prior to the recent death of Justice Lamar, a Democratic successor would perhaps have been inevitable even if a Republican President had been elected in 1912. President Taft's appointment of Justice Lamar, a Democrat, in 1910 was supposed to be the result of this unwritten rule, but probably there were additional reasons for his action. He had previously appointed Justice Burton and moved up Justice White, another Democrat, to the position of Chief Justice after the death of Chief Justice Fuller. He also gave the Cabinet position of Solicitor-General to Frederick W. Lehmann, a Democrat.

President Taft appointed more men of the opposite party to high judicial position than any Executive preceding him. No doubt he approved of the Senate's unwritten rule regarding confirmations for the Supreme Court, but he seemed also to wish to be influenced by the question of fitness rather than of party. President Taft's judicial appointments were pretty generally commended even by his critics. A distinguished jurist himself, one who had hoped to sit on the supreme bench rather than become President, his ability to make good selecetions was generally recognized. Grateful Democrats have expressed the wish to see Mr Taft appointed to the Supreme Court, and, were it not that only two Democrats are now left in that court, the proposition might be seriously considered at Washington.

HAPPINESS AS A BY-PRODUCT

Suppose equality of income which so many radicals desire. would the human race be any happier then? Psychology, speaking through Hugo Munsterberg, answers "no." Although that answer runs counter to some current thinking it is most convincingly elaborated in his "Psychology and Social Sanity"

Inequality of income is but one of many inequalities of mind, face physique, personality, home surroundings which, if humanity were on an even keel economically would become intensified to the point of causing as much unhappiness as is now caused by envy roused through economic differences. Life is bearable says Professor Munsterberg, largely because of its compensations. The poor girl may beb eautiful, the ugly one wealthy. the rich couple at sword points, the struggling one united and blissful, the Goldens may hunger and thirst for friends and children while the Tins have both in abundance; genius may dream even though out at elbow and the boor be miserable and lonely in spite of his money; the smart man gets a living through his brains while the stupid man may marry a rich widow. Take away the financial off-sets and these other inequalities would assume greater sway.

Common experience reinforces Munsterberg's statement that neither prosperity nor economic progress increases the sum total of human happiness. This is perhaps the most prosperous of all centuries known to history, yet measured by any standard, by the number of suicides, intensity of social unrest, jealousy and strife, it is the unhappiest. Those who are the worst off economically rarely commit suicide; they endure while the death rolls of design are enlarged by persons comparatively well off. This is natural, for happiness is a state of mind while envy is a state of comparison. Double the income of all persons and you simply elevate the comparison without altering the judgment. People who are unhappy because they cannot have strawberries in Winter on $1,000 a year when their income is advanced to $5,000 a year will be sorry because they must drive an open car in Winter.

Happiness is a state of mind, a by-product of living, an intangible which cannot be measured in money. As Jane Addams says, "It happens alon gthe road." In this respect it resembles the four-leaf clover. Search for it in vain and presently when the tension is relaxed and you are looking for something else there is the coy freak of nature beneath your hand ready for the plucking. If this theory of Munsterberg's were generally understood and accepted every one would be happier. But when all is said and done do we want to be happy?—Ithaca Journal.

LITTLE TALKS ON THRIFT

By S. W. STRAUS

President American Society for Thrift

Whenever some one declares the American people extravagant, it is usually our habit to except the American farmer. In fact, we have considered him quite thrifty, yet on far too many American farms there is much waste from neglect and failure to take proper care of things which cost money.

Anyone who has ever been in the country will readily recall the sight of tools, machinery and vehicles exposed to the elements; poor, insanitary shelter or none at all for stock; chickens roosting in trees, or on fences for lack of proper coops; fruit trees untrimmed, laden with dead limbs and decayed spots on the trunks; gardens neglected, houses unpainted, doors unhinged, shingles broken and rain spouts and door steps out of repair.

Every one of these symptoms of shiftlessness spells loss of money.

Extravagance does not always mean an outlay of money, but may involve an outlay of unnecessary labor, through carelessness, which means a diminution of income. For instance:

Oneq uail will destroy 75,000 bugs and 6,000,000,000 weed seeds annually, according to Mrs. Margaret M. Nice, of the Massachusetts State University.

Cotton growers lose $100,000,000 a year because hunters slaughter by the thousands the quail, prairie chickens, meadow larks and other birds which destroy the boll weevil.

If the destruction of bug eating birds could be prevented, $1,000,000,000 a year would be saved to this country, says Colonel G. O. Shields, president of the League of American Sportsmen.

The Pennsylvania railroad doesn't throw away anything that has any value to man or beast. It gives us one of the very best examples of thrift. In 1914 the scrap material sold brought the company $2,157,241.24 and this was $1,000,000 less than in 1913. Waste paper alone sold for $19,211, oil barrels for $22,439 and old rubber for $15,222.

Locomotives and wooden passenger cars sold for $114,326. Other odds and ends brought $121,997. Old wheels, metals and wrought iron yielded more than $780,000. What the corporation can do on a large scale, the business firm, the farmer or the housewife can do on a small scale.

Harry Lauder has a few homely maxims on thrift that have been widely circulated during the war period, in the hope that his followers would profit thereby. "Mither wadna waste," says he, "and I would be disgracing her memory if I wasted." Here are some of his rules:

"Behave toward your purse as you would to your best friend."

"View the reckless spending of money as criminal and shun the reckless spender."

"Remember it only takes twenty shillings to make a pound, and twelve pennies make a shilling.

"You can sleep better after a hard day's work than after a hard day's idleness.

"Get good value from your tradesmen. They watch out that they get good money from you.

"A bank book makes good reading—better than some novels."

LAUDS LABOR MEN

Views of a Woman Writer on the American Federation Convention.

Ines Haynes Gillmore, writer, expresses these views of the American Federation of Labor convention in a San Francisco newspaper:

"It was like listening to the plans of generals of an army.

"I was truly impressed by the physical aspect of those men. They were the biggest, the most high standing, the most straight looking men I ever saw in my life. And they had more of the fighting spirit than all of the army and navy put together, because the army and navy are bureaucratic and fight for a position, while the American Federation of Labor fights only for labor.

"I believe that the labor union is the only thing that we have that is training men to citizenship. Our schools do not do it, or colleges do not do it. But as soon as a man joins a labor union he begins his training in citizenship. The remarkable intelligence of every man in that convention as to what was going on and their knowledge and understanding of it and all of the economic laws under it was the most impressive thing I have ever seen.

"I say this without qualification, and I go on record as saying this—that the best citizens the country has will be found among the unionists."

PATHE ACQUIRES THE RIGHTS

Remarkable List of Dramas Will Be Filmed Under George Fitzmaurice's Direction.

The New York newspapers have been giving considerable prominence of late to an agreement between the Pathe Exchange, Inc., and A. H. Woods, whereby Pathe receives the motion picture rights to all the plays that have been and will be produced by Mr. Woods. The announcement of the agreement is of particular importance to both the theatrical and motion picture worlds, since Mr. Woods is the owner of what has been the largest stock remaining of theatrical successes not yet put into pictures. The list of plays which thus becomes available for motion picture purposes is a most remarkable one, embracing as it does many of the greatest theatrical successes of recent years.

These plays have been the prize for which many motion picture concerns have been angling for many a day. At the time the papers were signed there were three large immediate cash offers lying upon Mr. Woods' desk. With the acquisition of the plays Pathe becomes the possessor of the best stock of picture material held by any company. That they will add prestige to the already well-known Gold-Rooster program, on which they will be placed, goes without question.

It is announced that work will be started at once upon the filming of these plays. George Fitzmaurice, who made for Pathe the big successes "Via Wireless" and "At Bay," has been entrusted with the production of many of the adaptations. In his casts will be used so far as possible the actors who appeared in the original productions, among whom are many of the leading players of the day, such as Florence Reed and Robert Edeson. George Brackett Seitz and Ouida Bergere, both well-known playwrights, will make the adaptations. The first play to be filmed will be "New York," with Miss Florence Reed.

The rise of A. H. Woods from ten cent melodrama to a position in the front rank of theatrical producers is one of the most spectacular in the history of the American theatre. Within a few years he has established himself firmly as the most successful original and daring of managers. A list of the "hits" during the past five years will show the name of A. H Woods tacked on the majority of the most emphatic ones. For instance it was he who gave us the international musical success "Madame Sherry," to be followed later in the operatic field by "Gypsy Love," which charmed two continents. He, too staged the laughable farce, "The Girl in the Taxi," which also was played abroad. It was Mr. Woods who made a star of Julian Eltinge, the famous impersonator. In "Potash and Perlmutter" he gave New York something new and scored another hit.

More recently he has given to the public such sterling successes as "The Song of Songs," "Kick In," "Innocent," "The High Cost of Loving," "The Yellow Ticket," "Common Clay," and "Abe and Mawruss," the last two the most notable successes of the current season.

As for players, Mr. Woods has assembled under his banner such prominent artists as John Mason, Jane Cowl, Dorothy Donnelly, Florence Reed, Richard Bennett, Julian Eltinge, Barney Bernard, Madame Cottrelly, Irene Fenwick, Cyril Keightley, Thomas A. Wise, Forrest Winant, Pauline Frederick, Lew Fields, Douglas Fairbanks, John Barrymore, Josephine Victor, Jane Grey, Emmett Corrigan, Macy Harlan, Marguerite Sylva, Dustin Farnum, William Farnum, Bernard Granville, Adele Ritchie, Sam Bernard, Louise Dresser and a host of others.

Mr. Woods is the owner of the Eltinge Theatre and lessee and manager of the Republic Theatre in New York. Pathe was represented in the negotiations by General Manager Louis J. Gasnier.

---

A Kipling work will at last be seen in motion pictures. He is one famous author who up to now has not lent his talents to the screen. Pathe, it is announced, has acquired the picture rights to "The Light That Failed," perhaps Kipling's best-known work, and turned it over to Edward Jose to produce.

---

For the first time in motion picture history two feature pictures will be made at the same time with the same cast. Edward Jose, the Pathe producer, is the man who is working the miracle, and he is enabled to, since he is producing Kipling's "Light That Failed," and Gilbert Parker's "The Weavers," both of which demand desert scenes and battles in which Arabs are engaged.

---

The first of the A. H. Woods theatrical successes to be put into pictures will be "New York." George Fitzmaurice, the Pathe producer, has just started work upon it, with the famous Florence Reed as his leading woman. "New York" will be released as a "Gold Rooster Play."

Landing of the Pilgrims.

Already various plans are mooted for celebrating in 1920 the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the pilgrims. One suggestion is that all furniture landed from the Mayflower and still carefully preserved should be put on exhibition at Plymouth in a spacious building designed for the purpose covering several acres of ground.—Youth's Companion.

Long Island's Canal Project.

Long Island is agitating a project for constructing a canal along the south shore to connect the great bays for a distance of 120 miles. It would reach New York harbor through Jamaica bay. The estimated cost of constructing the canal is $2,000,000, which it is proposed to divide equally between the state and federal governments.—New York Times.

New Test of Death.

A drop of ether injected into the eyeball is recommended by an Italian physician as the most reliable test of death. If life is still present the ether will cause a reddening of the eye, but if death has taken place there will be no change.

PRACTICAL HEALTH HINT.

Let the Baby Alone.

Next to cleanliness, which includes purity of food, possibly the most important thing in the care of a baby is the vital piece of negative advice—let it alone. It is doubtful if there is any other one thing which really does more harm to the baby and, ultimately, to the adult and to the race, than the neglect of this rule. The most vital part of the baby is its brain and its nervous system. The growth and development of its entire body is the direct result of the sensory impression received and recorded upon the brain. Even with the utmost quiet possible it is perfectly appalling to attempt to imagine the vast and constant stream of violent sensations received by an infant which has just made its entrance into a new world full of noise and moving things. Babies should never be played with, should never be bounced, trotted nor sung to, and never should be given noisy or complicated toys. They should not be exhibited to strangers nor taken where there are many persons. Excess of sensory impulses produced from such causes lead up to the nervous diseases and the peculiar weaknesses which characterize the American people.

THE UNION LABEL.

Speaking of the value of our union stamp reminds us that local unions having funds that they want to get rid of could better spend the money for promoting union stamp and union label demand than for social affairs. A banquet or eatables and drinkables by a less formidable name are things of the moment. A picnic is over in a day, but a dollar spent wisely and efficiently in promoting the demand for the union stamp and other union labels is a missionary whose work goes on forever.—Shoe Workers' Journal.

A GOOD INVESTMENT.

Union Funds Constitute an Investment For Those Who Build Them.

The one thing which employers fear in labor organizations is power. Power is necessary to make these organizations effective. Some employers have officially indorsed labor organizations of the "proper kind." Of course, the proper kind in their estimation is the carefully expurgated editions from which all evidences of power have been carefully repressed. Such institutions would be labor organizations in name only.

Only where organizations have power do they have effectiveness in bringing betterment into the lives of their members. Power cannot exist unless there exist the sinews and munitions for sustained insistence upon demands and rights. The power of an organization is related in a very vital sense to membership and to the dues paid into the union treasury.

Those organizations which are vigorous and powerful to promote the well being of their members are invariably those organizations which have established high dues. Union funds constitute a kind of insurance for those who constitute them. Considered from a business viewpoint, there is no investment that will give so high a rate of returns as union dues.

When the resources of an organization are ample, wage movements may be undertaken with a spirit of confidence and independence that has a helpful reaction upon recalcitrant employers.

Resources facilitate the extension of organization, which in turn increases the power of the organization through increasing solidarity. Union resources put confidence into the unorganized to incur risks resulting from enlistment in the ranks of the organized. Union resources protect the workers from wage reductions and poorer conditions of work because the power of self defense constitutes a real argument against injury or provocation of contest.

A low dues paying policy is not a profitable or a wise policy for organized labor. Indeed, it would be good business sense to increase dues with every wage increase. The wage increase was due to organization, and stronger organization will in turn bring other wage increases.

As union dues are increased more benefits can be made increasingly helpful and can be extended in variety. These benefits can be managed by the organizations more cheaply and more satisfactorily than similar insurance can be furnished by state or private agencies. Assuring the unions control over these benefits removes all doubt of such assistance in industrial disputes.

Labor organizations embody an ideal, but that ideal must rest upon a practical basis if the ideal is to become reality. The practical resources to make any ideal reality depend in some degree upon the financial resources at command. The question of higher dues is one of fundamental importance to all workers. It is a matter that must not be pushed aside. It is a matter that should be given most careful and wise consideration. It is a fundamental matter, because the dues paid in a large measure determine the power which the organization exercises for the cause of human welfare.—Samuel Gompers.

LUNGS OF A BATTLESHIP.

Ventilation Is a Serious Problem In Building War Vessels.

One of the most difficult problems in building a battleship is to secure satisfactory ventilation. She is a very complicated creature, made up of so many steel boxes, large and small, for the accommodation of officers, men, coal, ammunition and stores, dotted here and there with so many steel ladders, automatic lifts, steel bulkheads and water tight doors, varied here and there by miles of electric wires belonging to lights, telephones, bells and motors, to say nothing of the endless mileage of pipes for flooding, draining, pumping, fresh water, fresh air or compressed air and speaking tubes.

First in importance comes the ventilating of the boiler and engine rooms. When you begin to think of gangs of coal black demons working away in the bowels of the ship at a temperature of 120 degrees; when, too, you commence to realize that unless the furnaces receive their required draft the speed of the battleship drops to below that of her sisters in the squadron, you appreciate the importance of the steam driven fans to the furnaces and boiler rooms. The supply of air comes down through large water tight trunks, which are continued right up to the weather deck, armored gratings being provided at the protective deck.

For ventilating engine rooms large electric fans are employed. So, too, the coal bunkers have to be ventilated, owing to the gas which the coal gives off. This gas when mixed with air forms an explosive, so in order to prevent the possibility of injury to men or ship supply and exhaust pipes are fitted in such a manner as to cause a current of air.—Pearson's Weekly.

Only Nation Without Budget.

We are the only civilized nation that hasn't a budget system. France, Germany, Russia, Japan, England, Italy, Spain, Rumania, Servia, Portugal, Bulgaria and Venezuela—all these countries and many more have budgets In each country, that is, certain responsible officers prepare a definite plan for doing things, estimate the cost of executing it and suggest means for raising the money. There is only one important nation that has no business plan, and that is the one that has chiefly distinguished itself as a nation of business men—the United States.—World's Work.

Need of Contrast In Beauty.

An essential prerequisite to all beauty is contrast. To obtain artistic effect light must be put in juxtaposition with shade, bright colors with dull, a fretted surface with a plain one. Forte passages in music must have piano passages to relieve them, concerted pieces need interspersing with solos, and rich chords must not be continuously repeated. This general principle will, I think, explain the transformation of the bygone useful into the present beautiful. It is by virtue of their contrast with our present modes of life that past modes of life look interesting and romantic.—Herbert Spencer.

ROOSTER KILLS CHILD.

Fowl Attacked Los Angeles Lad, Who Was Feeding Chickens.

Los Angeles, Cal.—John M. Seaman, two-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Seaman of this city, is dead at Ontario following an attack by a large rooster at the ranch home of the child's grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. V. Lawrence of that city.

John and his mother visited at the ranch. The chickens were a novelty to the boy, and he was anxious to feed them. With prodigious bravery that was thought only childishly cute he accomplished his desire. A few days ago he was so engaged when a large rooster jumped at the little fellow and buried its spurs deeply in his scalp.

Blood poisoning developed, and the child died in a hospital after much suffering.

Paying Calls In Russia.

Town life in Russia is as different as can be from life in the country districts. One curious custom is the after dinner call. People call on their friends after dinner at night or even after the theater, paying calls at midnight being quite the thing to do. The Russian dinner always begins with a sideboard course of cold meats, hors d'oeuvres, etc.—that is to say, the dishes are laid out on the sideboard and the guests help themselves before sitting down to partake of the regular meal. It is from this custom that we derive the term "service a la Russe" as applied to dinners at which the carving is done from the sideboard.—London Answers.

WITH THE SUFFRAGISTS

In Oklahoma on New Year's Day over two thousand Osage Indians became full citizens as the result of a decision handed down by Federal Judge Hudson, and all over the country in consequence suffragists renew their plea. "If Indians can vote, why not women."

* * *

In Boston thel ong struggle made by women lawyers to be admitted to the Bar Association has ended in the success of thew omen. The vote in favor stood 34 to 16. The many women practising law in Boston are said to be elated over the victory, and a large number are expected to make application for membership.

* * *

"Nothing in my opinion," said Senator Morris Sheppard of Texas in a recent New York address on Christian Citizenship, "could be more inaccurate than the contention that the prohibition and suffrage amendments to the Federal Constitution involve a violation of state's rights. The states reserved to themselves the right to amend the Constitution by a vote of three-fourths of their constitution number. The prohibition and suffrage amendments merely enable the states to exercise their rights."

In Delaware there are still about a score of offenses for which the offenders can be publicly whipped. Pressure of public opinion has been brought in vain against this relic of barbarism. The legislature of last winter voted by a large majority to retain the whipping post.

Remembering Elizabeth Fry who introduced the humanities into prisons and the services of women everywhere in introducing the amenities into life, woman suffrage in Delaware would seem to be indicated as a desirable political innovation.

"Two years ago it was a pleasant diversion for a congressman to attack suffrage; gone are those days, for congress has felt the menace or the actual impact of woman's political power," writes Max Eastman in The Masses in discussing the policy of the Congressional Union in bringing pressure from thew omen voters to bear on Congress and the President, and he adds. "The women of the Congressional Union seem to already have thep olitical wisdom which will come to all women after they have had a little political experience."

* * *

In pleading for the passage of the woman suffrage amendment before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives Mrs. Ueland of Minnesota said that the constitution of that state was so worded that it was practically impossible to pass any amendment that had any opposition; that last year out of eleven amendments submitted to the people, but one passed and to that there was no opposition. From which facts she argued that without Federal action thew omen of Minnesota would be forever disbarred from voting citizenship.

SCRUB TEAM WON EASILY

Substituting for the Oswego Goose bones Second team, with whom the Maccabee second team had scheduled a game for last night on the local's court, a picked team of two high school players and three others easily scored a defeat over thel odge boys by superior all-around playing. The final score was 50-42.

The game wasv oid of sensational shots owing to the desire of both teams to bring theb all right up to the basket before attempting a shot, and in this department of theg ame the "pickups" excelled. Considering the fact that itw as the first match game in which the Maccabees had participated, their passwork was of a complimentary nature.

"Scoty" Smith and Seymour were the individual stars of the game, the two time and again bewildering their guards by rapid passwork which invariably resulted in scores.

At the end of the first half the score stood 24-24, but after the rest period, the pickup team took a prolonged spurt and gained an advantage which was maintained throughout the remainder of the game.

ROCHESTER MENDER HAS A STRAD, HE SAYS

What he declares is a Stradivarius violin has been picked up quite by accident in Rochester by Joseph Sentiff of that city, who is a violin mender and expert. He was called to a pawnbroker's establishment to get some violins which needed repairing. There were three violins and among them was the Stradivarius which the pawnbroker thought was in such bad shape that it deserved nothing but the ash heap, but Sentiff thought differently and bought the instrument. Even when he had purchased it he did not know that it was as valuable as he says it is for he bought it for the quality of the wood but on further examination it proved to be a work from the hands of the great master. Sentiff puts the date of making between 1720 and 1725 and values it at $30,000.—Auburn Citizen.

Higher Standard for Practice of Law, Plan of N. Y. Association

New York—The New York State Bar Association at its annual meeting in this city yesterday inaugurated a movement to standardize the requirements for entrance into the legal profession. William V. Rowe, whose resolution for the appointment of a special committee to undertake the work was unanimously adopted, explained its purpose.

He pointed out "the gradual lowering o fthe standards for admission to the bar" throughout the country. Twenty States have no standard at all, and in many others two years of night school attendance are sufficient.

"Those are the States," he declared, "that are the floodgates through which the uneducated hordes from Central Europe, brought up under codes absolutely hostile to the common law institutions and tranditions, enter our rannks."

Mr. Rowe presented his resolution following an address by J. Newton Fiero, Dean of the Albany Law School, on "Legal Education."

"One would suppose," said Dean Fiero, "that the college man who comes to the bar would be superior in mental attainment and better able to carry on his work than the man who comes from the high school. Unfortunately, on the average, I find, as the result of my observation, inquiry and discussion, that is not so.

"The difficulty with the college man is that he too frequently comes to his work with an overweighing sense of his superiority, and with habits of life and study which do not fit him for the work before him. The time spent in college seems to be of little advantage in the majority of cases in the way of mental discipline. Whether this is due to the undue prominence of athletics, or the social side of college life, I cannot say."

The meeting adopted another resolution reaffirming its declaration a year ago in favor of limitation of armaments by international agreement. It also declared in favor of an international police to enforce the judgments of an International Court at the Hague on internation ldisputes.

Daniel S. Remsen, chairman of the committee on the prevention of unnecessary litigation, asked that it be continued another year. This was approved and at his suggestion the committee was instructed:

"To join with the committee of the Chamber of Commerce in the preparation of a few simple rules for the guidance of laymen in the prevention of unnecessary litigation, and to report to the association at its next meeting a plan for arbitration within the profession for lawyers to recomment to clients wishing to settle their disputes by arbitration."

"PERJURY PREVALENT"

The Remsen Committee also reported that "perjury in judicial procedings is alarmingly prevalent, and is of sufficient importance to require the attention of a special or standing committee of this association."

The Committee on Legal Ethics called attention to "cases of the grossest impropriety constantly being brought to the attention of members of he Bar involving the most flagrant methods of solicitation and self-advertisement, wholly inconsistent with the essential dignity of the profession.

"There has come to the observation of members of your committee circulars by associations—whether of attorneys or not does not appear, but carrying a name implying that they are made up of attorneys—which, in consideration of apecuniary payment will extend the general services of a tout, incorporated, for the period of one year or until discontinued on written notice.

"There are, particularly addressed to furnishing the lawyer who pays for this service, facilities for securing the control of bankruptcy cases by advance information with regard to the names and addresses and claims of thec reditors of the bankrupt in ny part of the United States."

A Complication of Love and War

By ELINOR MARSH

My grandfather was graduated from college in 1859. At that time the plantation system in the south was attractive to northern young men, and he determined to go south as a tutor in some southern family. Events leading to the war between the states were coming on rapidly, and there was already much prejudice in the south against northerners. Nevertheless my grandfather, Gilbert Hastings, secured such a position as he desired in the state of Georgia in the family of Fitzhugh Griggs, who owned a large plantation worked by 800 negroes.

His duties were to prepare the older son, Herbert, for college and teach the younger children in the elementary branches. There was a daughter two years older than Herbert, whose studies in literature young Hastings was expected to conduct.

It is strange that parents will permit the intimate association of a son or daughter with one whom they would not approve for a wife or husband, for a love affair is most likely to be the result. The present case was no exception to the rule.

However, no one was aware of it except the lovers. When both the south and the north were arrayed against each other by the firing on Fort Sumter my grandfather left for his home with the understanding that when peace came he would return and see what could be done in gaining Olivia's parents' consent to their union. But the outlook was not hopeful.

In the spring of '64, when General Sherman was making his march to the sea, my grandfather, who was a lieutenant in the invading army, passed near the plantation where a few years before he had been a tutor. Being familiar with the region and able to imitate the southern accent, he volunteered to disguise himself as a poor white countryman and go forth for information as to the location and numbers of the enemy's forces. He was recognized by one he had known during his residence there and turned over to the Confederate authorities, by whom he was tried and sentenced to be hanged as a spy.

As a last resource he sent to the plantation to learn if Fitzhugh Griggs was there and if he would not intercede for him. Griggs had commanded a Georgia regiment, had been wounded and was at home recovering from his wound. He declined to interfere to save Lieutenant Hastings until his wife and Olivia begged so hard that he should do so that be at last consented Having great influence with the officer into whose hands the spy had fallen, his efforts were successful. Colonel Griggs not only succeeded in saving my grandfather's life, but in having him paroled to remain on the Griggs plantation till the end of the war.

The planter's children had received no instruction for several years. Herbert had recently entered the Confederate army, but the younger members of the family were growing up in ignorance. It was this that induced Colonel Griggs to suggest that Hastings be paroled on his plantation. He desired that he should resume his duties as teacher.

But this plan placed Lieutenant Hastings in an equivocal position. His life had been saved by Colonel Griggs, and his intimacy with the colonel's daughter was resumed, Griggs not dreaming that Olivia was in love with a northern soldier who had been condemned as a spy. Not only would it be dishonorable in Hastings to take advantage of his position to possess the girl he loved, but his sentence had been merely suspended, and at a word from Griggs he could be sent to the gallows.

The strain upon the lovers was very great. My grandfather, who was an honorable man, treated Olivia as if there had been nothing lover-like between them, and she, not realizing the cause of such treatment, made it very hard for him. During the balance of the war, though it was but a few months, he was subject to a terrible temptation. The more he endeavored to treat Olivia with apparent indifference the more difficult became his position. At last he said to her: "If your father knew of our relationship he would doubtless consider that I was acting a dishonorable part. My life is in his hands. We do not know but that he would send me back to the authorities to meet the doom of a spy."

This frightened Olivia to such an extent that she controlled herself, and no one on the plantation suspected that she and Lieutenant Hastings were lovers until they made the fact known themselves.

The war closed in April, leaving Colonel Griggs with a wrecked plantation and all the negroes freed by virtue of the emancipation proclamation. From a rich man he had been reduced to poverty. Hastings went north to find that his father early in the war had bought cotton at a low price and sold it at a price varying from $1 to $2 a pound. This had made him a rich man.

The ex-lieutenant returned to Georgia and made a formal application for the hand of Olivia. Since he was the sole heir to a fortune and the colonel was a pauper, the man who would have spurned him as a son-in-law before now gave a willing consent. He and my grandmother were married and went north. I am one of their numerous grandchildren.

Bowser's Old Coat

And Why the Rag Man Didn't Get It.

By M. QUAD

Copyright, 1915, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

References have been made in these articles to Mr. Bowser's wallet and the care he takes of it o' nights. Mr. Bowser inherited this prudence from male ancestors dating back hundreds of years. Only about one man in fifty—that is, one husband—leaves his wallet so carelessly about that it becomes a temptation to his wife.

Mr. Bowser is neither a stingy man nor a suspicious one. He is simply a prudent man. He realizes that should Mrs. Bowser have a ferocious attack of insomnia some night at midnight, while he was peacefully snoring away, she would get up and walk the floor. Her eye would catch the end of his wallet sticking out of the inside pocket of his coat, and she would naturally withdraw that wallet. She would also naturally open that wallet and count the contents. As a wife, she would feel that a third of the wealth belonged to her, and she might take a ten dollar bill and lay it aside for future use. When Mr. Bowser came to count the contents in the morning and discovered a shortage he would be perplexed as to whether he gave it to the heathen the day before or a burglar had entered the house during the night.

Mr Bowser, like other husbands, has been known to carry his prudence so far as to hide his wallet under the front steps just previous to bedtime.

HE WAS RACING AGAINST TIME

He has hidden it in the house in forty different places, and he has always heaved a great sigh of relief when he has found it safe in the morning. The other day, while hunting for an old hat in his clothes closet, he saw one of his old coats hanging on a hook. It had a tail pocket. The wallet might be placed in that pocket time after time and Mrs. Bowser would never discover it. He made a mental note of this, and that night the wallet rested in a new place.

Next morning as Mr. Bowser was yawning and stretching and preparing to arise and go down to his breakfast a dog fight took place in front of his house. He jumped out of bed and yelled to the smaller of the two dogs to go in and win. At the breakfast table he was still excited over the scrap, and when he started for his office the wallet still remained in the pocket of the old coat. He had street car tickets and did not discover the loss until he came to pay for his noonday luncheon. Then he could not pay. He had neither change nor wallet.

The waiter observed that no such game could be played on the house, and Mr. Bowser had to leave his watch as security for 30 cents. He remembered where he had left that wallet, and he started for home instanter. He did not take the trolley car. It was too slow for him. He started off on a fast walk, which gradually grew into a hobble and the hobble into a run. In the last half mile of the race he carried a red face, his eyes bulged out, and his hat was in his hand. Scores of men called to him to ask what was the matter, but he never answered nor paused for a moment. He was racing against time. At any moment Mrs. Bowser might find that wallet and extract a bill.

Mrs. Bowser got a great shock when Mr. Bowser burst into the hall and had to sit down on the lower step of the stairs and gasp for breath. While a hundred feet from his gate he had seen an old rag buyer pass out with a full sack over his shoulder. Perhaps Mrs. Bowser had been selling him his old clothes and that old coat was among the garments.

"What on earth is the matter?" she exclaimed, as she leaned against the wall for support.

"Did you—did you"—

"Did I what?"

"Did you sell that man any old clothes?"

"Why, yes. But what has that got to do with your coming home this time of day?"

"You—you sold my old clothes, did you? Woman, you have ruined me!"

And Mr. Bowser jumped up and dashed out of doors and down the steps and looked for the ragman. He was just turning a distant corner, and he was pursued. He entered a house two blocks below, and Mr. Bowser missed him. He was running about like a dog seeking a lost trail when a policeman stopped him and asked him if his house was on fire or his wife was dying. Just then the old ragman showed up a block away, and Mr. Bowser broke from the policeman's grasp and galloped away. The old man heard the clatter of his feet behind him and looked around, and then started off at his best pace. No old man can run very fast with a big sack bumping his back at every jump, and Mr. Bowser soon overhauled the fugitive and had the sack in his possession.

"What you fight me for?" was demanded of him.

"You bought some old clothes on Third place half an hour ago. I want a coat you bought."

"I no buy a coat there."

"Don't lie to me, you old villain! Where is that coat?"

And Bowser was pulling the garments out of his sack, and the old man was trying his hardest to prevent, when the policeman came up. In response to his demand, two stories were told, and as they did not agree he walked the two men to the station house. When the same two stories were told to the sergeant at the desk he replied:

"We will have the sack searched and see."

It was searched, and there was no coat in it.

"He stopped somewhere and hid it!" shouted Mr. Bowser.

"I no buy coat there. I no see wallet. I was some poor and honest man!" protested the old man.

"Is your wife at home?" asked the sergeant of Mr. Bowser.

"She is," was the reply.

"Then step to that telephone and ask her to come down here. You can wait in the back room until she arrives."

"But, man, I am Mr. Bowser!" roared the hero of the wallet and the old coat.

"That makes no difference to me. If your wife does not come down here I will have you locked up, and you might later tell your story in court. You seem to be a very bullheaded sort of man."

It took Mrs. Bowser over half an hour to dress and get down there. Mr. Bowser greeted her with almost a shout of relief, but the sergeant waved him aside with the words:

"You keep quiet, old man, while I ask your wife a few questions. Now, then, Mrs. Bowser, you sold this old man some old clothes, did you?"

"Yes, sir."

"How many garments in all?"

"Why, five or six, I guess. There were two old suits and parts of two or three more, and some of them had been lying around the house for two or three years."

"But this coat was an old brown one—a cutaway," put in Mr. Bowser.

"Didn't I tell you to keep still?" thundered the sergeant. "About sixty days behind the bars is what you seem to be aching for!"

"I didn't sell that one," said Mrs. Bowser. "I saw it hanging on the hook and thought you would need it when you were working about the house. No; I did not sell that one, and I felt in the pockets of all I did sell before I let them go. Besides this, I knew your wallet was in that coat, for I saw you hide it there last night."

"You are evidently a mean old husband," said the sergeant to Mr. Bowser. "I'll bet your wife don't get 10 cents a week for pin money. I will send an officer up with you to see if the story of the coat is true. It probably is, for I don't believe such a nice little woman would tell a lie about it."

And an officer accompanied them home and went upstairs and saw the coat with his own eyes. It was hanging there as safely as money in a savings bank. A tail pocket was investigated, and the missing wallet was brought forth and opened to the broad light of day.

"That's mine!" exclaimed Mr. Bowser as he reached for it.

"You are a nice old guy" said the officer as he handed the wallet over. "You not only hide your money for fear your wife may get hold of a dollar, but you go away and forget it and then create such a row that the whole county is asking who has been murdered in his bed. Say, old chap, you had better make a change or you will find yourself in a heap of trouble. Good day, Mrs. Bowser. I am sorry for you."

And when the officer had left the house Mr. and Mrs. Bowser sat down and looked at each other for a long, long time. Then Mrs. Bowser broke into a laugh and said:

"Mr. Bowser, this is the dead line. We will consult our respective lawyers and procure a divorce as soon as possible."

And something like a smile hovered around Mr. Bowser's mouth as he replied that, being it was a broken day, he would not go back to the office, but would stay home and fix the lower hinge on the front gate.

Aunt Sally's Bike

By M. QUAD

Copyright, 1915, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

Things in and around the village of Poolsville had got into perilous state.

Not a tin peddler had entered the town for six weeks, and half the pans and coffeepots were leaking.

Business was so quiet that an order for a whole gallon of molasses was almost town's talk.

One of the inhabitants of Poolsville was Aunt Sarah Tooker. She was widowed six years before and lived with her daughter. Aunt Sally had always been a hustler, and when a dull time came to Poolsville she had always been ready to bestir herself to end it. She was ready to help end this. She went to Deacon Thatcher and indignantly asked:

"Are you men going to let this town fall into its mudhole and give a last gasp?"

"Why, Aunt Sally, what can be done?" he asked in reply. "We are in a rut here, and we've got to stay in that rut till Providence boosts us out of it."

Aunt Sally went home to say to her daughter:

"Hanner, I am going over to Guilford to see sister Kate for two weeks."

It was in the early days of the bike. The machine had been adopted in almost every other town around, but Poolsville frowned upon it.

Aunt Sally Tooker knew just how the bike was regarded in her home town, and she knew that she was sixty years old and was expected to set a good example for the younger folks. Nevertheless, she had only reached Guilford, when she said to her sister:

"Sister Kate, have they bikes for sale in Guilford?"

"Why, of course," was the reply.

"Then get on your bonnet and go with me to buy one."

"For a nephew?"

"No, sir; for yours truly, Aunt Sally Tooker! I have come over here to learn to ride the bike, and I can't get at it a minute too soon."

"But you are not going to ride the bike in Poolsville!" gasped the sister. Why, they will mob you over there!"

"Let them mob and be darned. That's where I'm going to ride the bike. The old town is in a rut, and I'm going to wake her up."

In a week she could ride up a hill and down, and when the time she had given herself to remain in Guilford had expired she started for Poolsville on her bike.

The highway leading out of and into Poolsville is a hill with a gentle slope half a mile long, and it was the hour of noon one day when Aunt Sally Tooker reached the brow of this hill. There she rested and looked down upon the village. It seemed asleep.

It was after Aunt Sally had surveyed this peaceful scene for five minutes that she uttered three or four long drawn screams and mounted her bike and started down the hill. Though her screams aroused the town as the report of a cannon would, all of a sudden people appeared at their doors and their gates and exclaimed to each other:

"What in heaven's name is that? Has the judgment day come at last?"

It hadn't, but Aunt Sally Tooker and her bike had.

She was coming down that long grade, holding her bike steady with one hand and waving her bonnet with the other. She went through that village like a cannon ball.

At the farthest outskirts of the village Aunt Sally turned about and came whizzing back to dismount in front of the postoffice, where the crowd was thickest.

"Now, ma, you have done it!" was the greeting of her daughter as she entered the house.

"Yes, I have woke up Poolsville, and you are going to see things hum," was the proud reply.

It wasn't an hour later before the "hum" was heard and seen. The minister of Aunt Sally's church appeared to ask:

"Sister, is that your bike?"

"I paid $85 for it, parson."

"And are you going to ride it in Poolsville?"

"Morning, noon and night and sometimes in the afternoon."

"Then, sister, you must take the consequences."

"I will, parson."

The consequences were that charges were preferred against Aunt Sally.

The charges against Aunt Sally were for riding a bike in the public streets and thereby injuring the cause of religion. In five minutes her lawyer tore these charges to shreds. In five more those who made them were made ashamed of themselves. You can judge of this line of argument.

Aunt Sally was very promptly acquitted. For a few weeks most of the members of the church turned a cold shoulder upon her and the neighbors kept aloof, but she went on riding her bike until Deacon Dhurber said to the crowd at the postoffice one evening:

"Boys, we have got to let up on her. When you come right down to it she has as much right to ride a bike as we have a horse, and you can't say she don't do it a darned sight more modestly. We all know she's woke up Poolsville, and we are getting the benefit of it. So let us stop this nonsense."

And the nonsense was stopped, and Aunt Sally contributed $15 toward repainting the meeting house.

LADY BECK.

The first woman invited to judge at the national horse show was Lady Beck. At the show, which was held in Madison Square Garden, New York, she officiated with Mr. James G. Marshall of the Riding club in awarding the prizes for undocked saddle horses of the thoroughbred type.

Lady Beck is an Englishwoman who has ridden to hounds in Leicestershire, as well as in Canada and Virginia. At the last national horse show she rode her own hunters over the jumps in Madison Square Garden.

What she knows about hunters was in evidence at the last international horse show in England, where three horses from her stable defeated the pick of the British entries for the capital prize of the show.

Lady Beck is the wife of Sir Adam Beck, a director of the international horse show. Their home is in London, Ont.

Lady Beck goes in largely for blacks and browns. At the afternoon sessions she wore a brown tailored suit topped with a small high standing hat, encircled with black paradise feathers, and brown fox furs.

Desserts For Children.

Fairy Apples.—Pare and core enough tart cooking apples to fill a baking dish; cover them with sugar and put a little cold water in the dish, also several slices of lemon and two cloves; then pour a little melted butter over the apples and bake them until tender. Serve them cold, with a blob of fruit jelly put on the top of each and whipped cream about them.

Ambrosia.—This delicious dessert requires grated cocoanut, sliced oranges and bananas, sugar and a wee taste of lemon juice. Fill a dish with layers of the different fruits, putting sugar over each one, and continue in this way until the ingredients are all in. Let the dish blend while in a cool place before serving. Fresh cocoanut is needed, and if the milk of the fruit is sweet this may be added to the dessert.

Brown Sugar Sandwiches.—For the children incessantly craving sweets brown sugar is an excellent thing to keep in the house. Spread it thickly on buttered white bread and put the slices together so as to make narrow sandwiches.

Quick Gingercake Pudding.—Get any sort of small or large ginger or molasses cakes from the grocer and cover them with a custard made of boiling hot milk into which several eggs are beaten up. Pour the milk gradually into the eggs, stirring vigorously all the while; sweeten and pour over the cakes, allowing them to stand until they have drunk up a good deal of the custard. Serve warm or cold.

ANIMALS IN THE WAR.

A Record in the Variety Used Made in the Present Conflict

In no other war in the world's history have so many kinds of animals been employed in the actual conduct of hostilities. The list of beasts engaged in the present conflict includes horses, mules, dogs, oxen, elephants, goats and camels. Dogs are doing sentry duty, hauling light guns and serving with the ambulance corps. Goats are necessary to provide food for the Indian troops attached to the army divisions of Great Britain, and elephants, where the climatic conditions permit of their employment, are used in handling heavy timber. Camels have proved invaluable in the Turkish campaign and, already, as is the case with all beasts of burden, their value has increased tremendously.

Experts have recently begun to give serious attention to the problem of keeping up the supply of the various animals necessary for the vast operations of the hostile forces, and the prediction is freely made that if the war continues another year the supply will not be equal to filling a tenth of the demand.—Boston Herald.

STRIFE IN THE CABINET.

Washington Had Troubles of His Own In His Official Family.

To represent the factions fairly, Washington chose for his cabinet four men who could not have differed more in character had he summoned them from the ends of the earth.

For secretary of state he chose Jefferson, the ardent theorist who had done his country the service of formulating the Declaration of Independence and was perhaps better known abroad than any American save the aged Franklin. For secretary of the treasury he called to him the phenomenal Hamilton, with the frame of a lad and the intellect of a giant, to whom it was given to perform miracles with an empty exchequer. The secretary of war was General Knox, large and showy, but, despite his pompous speech and grandly flourishing cane, a man of experience not only in battle, but in administering this same office under the Continental congress. The attorney general was Edmund Randolph, who proved of weaker moral fiber than the others.

Jefferson was the strong opposing personality of the administration. He had little patience with General Knox, whom he called "a man of parade," and he and Hamilton quarreled almost daily upon every conceivable topic, for Hamilton, Federalist to the core by instinct and conviction, became as inevitably spokesman for the party in power.

Even Washington could not preserve harmony in such a cabinet, and before the end of his first term both Hamilton and Jefferson resigned. Afterward the president had still greater difficulty with his council. His critics taunted him with being able to get only second rate men to fill their places, and Vice President Adams asserted that it was this, not high devotion to principle, that caused him to refuse a third term. But Adams was neither generous nor always just in his estimate of others.—Helen Nicolay in Century Magazine.

Unconquerable.

The habit of never being whipped, of always keeping up the fight—that is the quality of the great leader. The man who never admits defeat is the man the world has to take into account. Time and again the foes he is fighting may think they have him down. But before they know it he is on his feet sounding the advance. Such a man molds events. He helps create the new heavens and the new earth of the prophet's vision. A mighty force of the universe is the unconquerable soul!

Notes For The Beauty Seeker

Beauty is rather an indefinite thing at best. What spells beauty to some eyes means nothing at all to others. Every one seeks it, yet no one can exactly define it. It is, after all, more a matter of comparison perhaps than anything else, for the village belle who is ravishingly lovely in the midst of her plain companions may seem gawky and without charm when placed in the midst of city beauties.

The girl who lives close to nature inherits a large part of Mother Earth's rich dowry of beauty. Nature bestows on its children gratis all the complexion lotions and hair tonics which the beauty doctors prescribe for large fees. The trouble is that city dwellers are so far away from nature's heart that they have no idea of the gifts she is willing to bestow. They depend on creams, powder and rouges to do for them what nature would gladly do if they would allow her.

If city women would only forswear the artificialities and rely on nature to supply their needs they would find their complexions rejuvenated. Complexions grow old before their time with the constant application of powders and rouges. To free them from this bondage of cosmetics means to restore natural loveliness again.

Beautiful complexions are only possible where health abounds. A clear skin is, as a rule, the result of good circulation, and in order that the blood may flow freely plenty of outdoor exercise is necessary. Hours in the open air are a part of nature's beauty treatment, which is the reason why the country maid has the advantage of her city sister.

Two of the finest skin tonics in nature's storehouse are rainwater and milk. When the rainy days come, instead of sitting down and bewailing the awful weather, just thank your lucky stars for the splendid tonic you are obtaining free of charge and put out all the receptacles handy to catch as much of it as possible. Keep a big bottle just for this purpose and into it pour the rainwater as you catch it. Use it on your face whenever you wash, and you will notice how it softens and clears the skin. Rainwater is wonderful for the hair also, and one woman with the most exquisite head of hair imaginable declares that she owes it entirely to the fact that she only uses rainwater with which to wash her hair.

Milk is a splendid skin tonic and has the effect of imparting its own color to the skin on which it is used. The only drawback to the constant usage of milk is that it is apt to grow a soft down on some faces. Those who use cold cream with impunity will find that milk has much the same effect, only more so.

Bath Robe of Fine French Flannel

Designed by Lane Bryant, New York.

FRENCH flannel is the material used in the making of this stylish bath robe. It is a fabric that makes up extremely well because, although not weighty, it is sufficiently warm to serve the purpose for which all bath robes are intended. The sailor collar, turnback cuffs and prettily shaped patch pockets are shell crochet bound and outlined with featherstitching in white silk. Featherstitching also outlines the raglan sleeves. The gown is shown in rose, copenhagen, blue, wistaria, gray and navy.

Skating is to rival dancing this winter, so the wise ones say, and skating costumes are already occupying feminine minds, although the weather man has given no assurance that there will be ice enough to warrant a special skating costume. One of the prettiest is of burnt orange duvetyn, with a tight band of skunk just below knee length. This can be unsnapped from the front panel, and, as the remainder of the skirt is shirred on elastic, there is enough "give" for the most enthusiastic skater. The Angora skating cap now shows a scarf extension, which can be wound about the neck above an Angora sweater coat to match.

• • •

Many new frocks and suits show separate shoulder capes, which can be removed to show a finished dress or suit. On a black suit of velvet such a cape is made of tailless ermine and covers a second cape of the velvet underneath. These are reminiscent of Puritan days.

• • •

Great quantities of tulle are being used on evening gowns not only for fashioning the gown, but for trimming purposes, in wisps of draperies, scarfs and in one gown as a train. A black and gold evening frock shows a wide piece of tulle caught across the back of the frock and held with jet bracelets to the wrists.

• • •

Ribbons have never before been used in such quantities. They are not ordered by the yard, but by the bolt, for several widths are employed on the same frock, while many frocks are mostly fashioned of ribbon. Hats, too, are many times trimmed only with ribbon.

• • •

Bodices are much, very much, on the basque order, fitted quite tightly with short flaring peplums and usually buttoned tight to the chin. Of course fur is the trimming par excellence, with much embroidery and metallic laces.

• • •

Fur and feathers are used in combination for hat trimming. Ostrich and ermine is a combination that is looked on with favor by the milliners. Ermine, by the bye, is seen this year with the tiny black tails.

• • •

Square shaped sailors are a novelty of the season, as are the mandarin hats sporting tassels of oriental coloring, whether formed of beads or silk. Spangled trimming, especially in blue tones, is a popular scintillating embellishment for the semi-evening toilet.

• • •

Huge corsage flowers are occasionally worn in the front of the bodice at the waist line on evening frocks.

• • •

The skirts of afternoon frocks are fuller than those of suits, of course and probably not quite so full as those of evening gowns, though it is a question whether one could possibly carry a skirt wider than six or seven yards even in the softest of satins or soiree silks.

Collars to Wear With the Season's Frocks.

An attractive set of collars for wear with separate waists of one-piece frocks. They are made of organdy, trimmed with hand embroidery.

The controversy between the sponsors of the high collar and low continues in merry indecision, while admirers of both effects welcome the novelties as they come and make their selection as the fancy dictates. In the designs shown here there is a wide choice, though simplicity is the keynote of the collars both as regard the construction and effect.

With the exception of No. 1, which requires 1 yard of 27 inch material, there is not a model in the group which requires more than ½ yard of organdy, batiste or lawn. Embroidery is the trimming used in every instance, though in the case of No. 2 a jabot of lace may be added if desired.

Two versions of the "Chin Chin" collar are illustrated in Nos. 1 and 4, the former fastening at one side and the latter at the back. Particular care is required in the cutting to preserve the gracefulness of the upper edge of the collar, for although it is quite large, it must be well cut and finished to be artistic. No. 1 is attached to a tucked chemisette which makes it suitable to wear with frocks that are cut very deep in front.

The chemisette front of No. 3 is unusually attractive, and the collar may be worn rolled high or low. The embroidery along the edge may be done in white or in colors since colored embroidery enjoys great vogue this season. The distinguishing feature of No. 5 is the revers cut in one with the sailor collar. A collar of this kind gives a dressy effect to a plain one-piece frock of silk or serge, especially when it is trimmed with hand embroidery.

All of the collars are cut from folded material, and seams are avoided in every instance possible. In the case of collar No. 1 the entire four sections—chemisette front and back and collar front and back—are cut on a lengthwise fold of material.

Consisting of only one piece No. 2 is also cut on a lengthwise fold of the organdy, and this is likewise true of Nos. 3, 4 and 5. In the case of collar No. 6 the collar and one set of tabs are cut on the fold of the goods, while the other set of tabs and the revers are laid on a lengthwise thread.

In case embroidery is to be used, the work should be done before the collars are cut.

TO PAY $48,490,000 IN TAXES

Assessment of the Reichsbank Under Terms of New Law.

The computation is made by the Overseas News agency of Berlin that the assessment for 1915 on the Reichsbank under the new law taxing war profits will amount to 193,960,000 marks ($48,490,000). Under the terms of the law the tax will not be collected during the war.

The law applies to the Reichsbank as follows: It must pay 100,000,000 marks saved in 1915 by the abolition of the former tax on circulating notes. It must pay 14,300,000 marks on extra profits in 1914 and 32,600,000 marks on war profits in 1915. The regular taxes, amounting to 46,060,000 marks, bring the total to 193,960,000 marks.

Various Breads.

GRAHAM QUICK BREAD.—Sift into a mixing bowl a cupful of wheat flour and three heaping teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Then add a teaspoonful of salt, two cupfuls of graham flour, a tablespoonful of molasses and a well beaten egg, mixed with sufficient cold milk to form a stiff cake batter. The exact quantity of flour and liquid is hard to give, as the thickening properties of flours vary. Beat the batter hard until it is full of air bubbles, turn into a well greased bread pan and stand it in a warm place for thirty minutes. Bake in a moderately warm oven for thirty-five minutes. This quantity makes a medium sized loaf. If fruit and nuts are added the oven should not be quite so hot, and the bread should bake a little longer.

Oatmeal Bread.—Boil half a pint of oatmeal in one and a half pints of salted water for one hour. (Cooked oatmeal may be also utilized, but be careful that it is free from lumps.) When cooked, add three-quarters of a pint of milk, mix well and set aside until cold. Then place in a bowl, beat hard and add one and a half pints of flour that has been sifted with one teaspoonful of salt and three teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Stir the batter, which should be rather thick, until very smooth and bake in a greased pan for forty-five minutes.

Rye Bread.—Sift together one pint of rye flour, half a pint of wheat flour, half a pint of Indian cornmeal, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one teaspoonful of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt and rub in with the finger tips one tablespoonful of mixed lard and butter. Then mix to a smooth batter with the addition of three-quarters of a pint of sweet milk. If caraway seeds are liked half a cupful may be added just before the bread is turned into the pans. Bake in a moderate oven for forty-five minutes.

Brown Bread With Baking Soda.—The first formula given for quick graham bread may be made with the same proportions, save that one teaspoonful of baking soda is used with three-quarters of a cupful of well soured milk in place of the sweet milk and baking powder; chopped nuts and raisins may also be added to this formula.

Simplicity, Style and Good Contour Are Here Upheld.

UP TO THE MINUTE.

This beautiful afternoon frock comes in wistaria satin with a slight drape over the hips. The bodice is fashioned of creamy georgette crape, daintily outlined with hand embroidery in empire effect, while the crush girdle is gold threaded. The collar conforms to the dictum that, no matter what the style anteriorly, the back of necks must be covered. The crape sleeves are also strapped with narrow fur, while the cross band on the front of the neck is novel and pretty. A wistaria crown with a fur stickup tops the gold lace brim of the modish hat.

THE MELLOW GLOW.

Suggestive Notes About the Charm of Lamplight and Mirrors.

Somehow or other the idea of selecting a lamp as a symbol of magic power was a good thought on the part of the tale teller who invented Aladdin, for there is a charm about lamplight that is hard to resist. As one woman who is doomed to high gas brackets in a boarding house always says: "There are two things which are going to predominate in my house if I ever have one of my own, and they are lamps and mirrors. There will be a low shaded lamp in every corner and a mirror to reflect it."

Surely the searcher after enchantment will not have a hard time of it in the modern lamp store. Any period, color scheme and decorative theme can be matched up in a lamp. The newest additions to these gloom dispellers are the Japanese lacquer lamps with shades to match. They are rather tall, but very graceful, and are in the familiar black lacquer ware, with its gold and red traceries. The shades are of heavy prepared paper, echoing the same lacquered patterns. This matching of shades with stands is not limited to the Japanese lamps. There are very pretty pottery bases in black and white or colors which have the designs repeated upon the paper shades.

Crackleware standards are unique in their pebbly colored simplicity. They may be low and bulging or high and tapering, but they require for effect a black and white or bright colored shade on simple lines. Wicker lamps are pretty for the wicker living room table or for the bedroom. When they are enameled in white they often show dainty silk or chintz flowered shades.

Mahogany stands are very popular for more formal use. Often they are wired for electricity, as are all the others previously mentioned, and are used with colored silk shades, shirred and fringe trimmed, or with a high colonial glass shade on the order of the large glass shaded candlesticks of bygone days. One of these mahogany candlesticks has a tall glass cup shade decorated with a small landscape in tones of sepia.

Floor lamps are coming in again for more general use. The standards are often mahogany, oak to match the furniture, brass or bronze. A novelty in these lamps is a small smoking tray and accessories attached to a standard about halfway to the floor.

Enlivened the Scene.

The first night I sang Falstaff at Covent Garden, said David Bispham. Beerbohm Tree—he is now Sir Herbert, of course—helped me to make up for the part. He had played the famous role himself, and he was anxious to have my makeup above reproach, for we were great friends.

"I FELT MY NOSE SLIPPING."

In those days—it was more than a dozen years ago—papier mache noses were not in use as they are today. Falstaff's huge, bulbous nose had to be built up out of "nose paste"—sticky stuff, very much like putty. If I do say it myself, my makeup was a work of art. But my costume was so heavy—I was padded out with a dozen suits and a huge stomacher—that I was perspiring copiously long before I made my first entrance. However, the applause I received when I went on made up for my discomfort, until in the midst of my most important song I felt my nose slipping from my face! I tried to put it back, but without success. In spite of everything I could do it fell to the stage in full view of the audience. A titter began in the orchestra chairs and soon grew into a roar of laughter, for in my efforts to kick the paste nose out of the way my foot slipped on the sticky stuff and I fell flat on the stage floor!—New York World.

Hassan's Proverb.

King Hassan, well beloved, was wont to say
When aught went wrong or any project failed,
"Tomorrow, friends, will be another day."
And in that faith he slept and so prevailed.

Long live this proverb! While the world shall roll
Tomorrows fresh shall rise from out the night
And new baptize the indomitable soul
With courage for its nev-r ending fight.

No one, I say, is conquered till he yields,
And yield he need not while, like mist from glass,
God wipes the stain of life-old battlefields
From every morning that he brings to pass.

New day, new hope, new courage—let this be,
O soul, thy cheerful creed! What's yesterday
With all its sheets and wrack and grief to thee?
Forget it, then. Here lies the victor's way.

—James Buckham.

Not Guilty.

The new member of congress was enjoying the hospitality of one of the most amiable and attractive women of the capital and was doing admirably until she led him into trouble with the remark: "I am afraid you find Washington rather dull at present. There is very little excitement, excepting what you find in the way of duty at the capitol."

"It is rather monotonous," he asserted.

"No doubt you have an occasional mauvais quart d'heure?"

"No," he replied, and then, leaning over confidentially, "I haven't tasted anything stronger than tea in a year."

Indorsed by the Professor.

Before President Angell of the University of Michigan had attained to his high position a young hopeful entering college was recommended to his consideration.

"Try the boy out, professor; criticize him and tell us both what you think," the parents said.

To facilitate acquaintance the professor took the boy for a walk. After ten minutes' silence the youth ventured, "Fine day, professor."

"Yes," with a faraway look.

Ten minutes more and the young man, squirming all the time, ventured, "This is a pleasant walk, professor."

"Yes."

For another ten minutes the matriculate boiled to his bones and then blurted out that he thought they might have rain.

"Yes." And this time the professor went on: "Young man, we have been walking together for half an hour, and you have said nothing which was not commonplace and stupid."

"True," answered the boy, his wrath passing his modesty, "and you indorsed every word I said."

Then they laughingly shook hands, and word went home from the professor that the boy was all right and that they were great friends.

Fear has been expressed by many that after the European war the United States would become the refuge of people who would find that the mother countries had acquired too many restraining influences to make it worth while to remain any longer. We now learn that we are to be in a way protected against this possible influx of perhaps some desirable but surely much undesirable material. In order to discover the probable amount of immigration to be expected after the European war is ended a nation wide canvass will be taken by the chamber of commerce of the United States. The canvass will be made through the railroad ticket agents of the country, who keep close tabs on the immigration situation and would therefore be in a position to know much of value to the investigators. They also are in touch with the steamship ticket agents, who can also give data of value. One of the objects will be to formulate plans to distribute those who are found desirable in order to avoid having them crowd into thickly populated sections. Whether it is found that a large immigration after the war is probable or not, the canvass will evidently yield much valuable information, as the problem of the placing of immigrants under normal conditions has been growing more difficult yearly. The matter of admitting only good assimilating material and barring the undesirable can also be taken under advisement and the necessary precautions taken for the best.

Perhaps most interesting of all "preparedness" documents is the special report of the army war college division of the general staff. It presents most thoroughly the possibility of American disaster through aggressive foreign military activity. The picture that the war college division draws is undeniably alarming. It shows the shores of the United States overrun with hostile soldiers while our own army is being organized. It shows a hostile force of 387,000 men and 81,270 horses with full equipment landing here in fifteen days after the defeat of our navy, with monthly additions of 440,000 men. At this rate the country could be conquered before more than a feeble initial resistance could be made. There is a point which must be calculated on in the figuring—the strength of our navy. All the figures of the war college are based on the foreign foe breaking through our coast defenses. The college will evidently insist on having our strongest barrier in a place where an enemy would be nearly whipped and practically useless if he ever should break through the outer defenses.

"Old Man" With Four Legs Fashioned by Prisoner.

QUIETLY RIPS SAFE KNOB.

Marks Found After Robbery in Michigan Trust Company at Grand Rapids Spoke Volumes to Detectives—Weighs Less Than Ten Pounds, but Does Job. Sometimes "Soup" Is Needed.

Grand Rapids, Mich.—A few years ago a mechanician fashioned a few strips of steel at his home forge, and the grotesque creation of this man, who is now serving time in the Ohio penitentiary, was christened "old man," and by way of distinction he was spoken of as having four legs.

When top story men worked in the Michigan Trust building here on a recent Sunday and tore out the combinations of two safes and shot another with nitroglycerin the "old man" with the four legs left his imprints on the safes. Where his "feet" had been planted were four deep dents. Those marks spoke volumes to the detectives.

Only expert safe crackers use the "old man." The man whose brain gave birth to this ingenious tool fashioned a most powerful and useful implement for the craft who use explosives and drill steel safes for a living when some commonwealth is not feeding and housing them in exchange for a safe cracking job or some other depredation.

A piece of steel fashioned into the semblance of a narrow horseshoe is the framework of the "old man." There is just enough room between these strips to enable the "old man" to drop over the knob of a safe. Four holes drilled in the "old man's" frame furnish the foothold for the four legs. The holes are threaded with a fine thread, as are the legs.

Once the "old man" fastens his grip upon the safe knob the legs are screwed into the holes. The close threads on bolts and hole give the "old man" a tremendous purchase power, and with a monkey wrench the legs are screwed down.

In a moment they are fast and the "old man's" back is bent to the task. So short and powerful is his frame and so closely set are his legs that there is no chance for him to bend at his work. The combination commences to give, and as the jaws of the wrench twist the legs in deeper the knob is slowly torn out. Entrance to the safe then is easy, and the inner compartments, once bared, are easily battered in.

The "old man's" right hand aid is a self fed drill, which can be fastened into the "old man's" frame as easily as one of the legs. An extra hole is drilled into the frame, and into this fits the threaded bolt that holds the drill steady and in place. But the drill is used only where the charge of "soup," or nitroglycerin, is resorted to in blowing the safe.

In this case the yeggs fasten the "old man" securely on the safe knob. The drill is placed, and the yegg then feeds the steel drill as he turns the handle. The bolt which holds the drill to its work and which is fastened into the "old man's" frame is one piece, while the drill is set inside of a threaded bolt that pushes it forward with the regularity the yegg uses in drilling.

After the hole is deep enough the "soup" is administered, and the hole is covered with wax and a fuse attached. Office rugs are thrown over the safe, and the yeggs step to one side as the fuse is fired. The real yegg uses just enough "soup" to accomplish the work of wrecking the safe without blowing the doors through a wall or making unnecessary noise.

The last job done in which the "old man" and a charge of "soup" were used was sufficient just to pull the door from its steel fastenings and hurl the combination out. Pushing back the bolts was nothing, and with a kit of special tools the yeggs soon entered the strong box.

The latest jobs credited to the "old man" with the four legs are those at Flint, in which much loot was taken from a bank; the Vermontville postoffice and the United Light and Railways company's offices here, in which the "old man" was clamped on three safes.

One of the most complete yegg outfits in captivity is in possession of Director of Safety A. A. Carroll, who has the "old man" with the four legs. Included in this outfit are drills of various sizes, threading tools, skeleton key, "soup" guns, wax, chisels and sundry articles. The outfit was taken from a pair of yeggs who were captured by Director Carroll, but who fled after they jumped their bail bonds.

So complete was the tool molded by the inventor of the "old man" that the police assert no added inventions have come to make such an instrument more useful.

A PUZZLE FOR A WHITE MAN.

Experience of an American Tourist Who Made a Bluff at Appearing to Know All the Ropes—A Patient Conductor and an Interested Cargo.

Writing of his adventures in the Chinese city of Shanghai, Homer Croy, in Leslie's Weekly, tells of the experience he had there in taking a ride on a street car:

The car was full of Chinamen, with not another white soul aboard, all sitting there in their skirts, their faces as expressionless as the heads of drums, but as soon as I came in their faces began to fill with interest, one nudging another until the whole car was looking at me.

I felt that something was wrong, but I could not figure out just what. I knew that it shouldn't create that much of a sensation for a white person to get on a car in Shanghai, but still they were looking at me as if I could be signed by a circus. I struggled to look unconcerned, but I knew that my cheeks were backfiring.

The conductor, in his suit of blue jeans, with a satchel over his shoulder, came up and said something to me, while I nodded with earnest carelessness and handed him a twenty cent piece, knowing that he could get enough out of it to satisfy his wants.

"Mun stau chong du?" he asked.

I nodded again and held out my hand for the change, plainly showing that I made the trip on the line twice a day.

"Mun stau chong du t'aing kaing shon da?" he asked with more feeling, pointing down the street with one hand.

"I didn't catch the drift of his remarks, but I wasn't going to show him that I wasn't an old citizen and taxpayer, so I shook my head this time and nestled back in the seat as if it were all settled. But the conductor became more excited than ever, drafted the other hand and gurgled:

"Mun stau chong du t'aing kaing shon da feah da tsu sz whoo peh quong?"

So I waved in the other direction and tried to nestle again, but the conductor came back with another round of monosyllabic re-enforcements. With that his fellow men in the car came to his help with an artesian of words, each one thinking that he could make it plain by raising his voice just a bit higher than any one else.

Reaching in his satchel, the conductor offered me a slip of paper spoiled with Chinese writing. I took it and started to stuff it nonchalantly into my pocket, but he became more excited than ever and came back with another string of empties, while I put the slip back into his hand as if it made not the slightest bit of difference in the world to me whether I kept it or whether he had it—I would leave the details of the trip to him.

The conductor used his hands some more and then turned and signaled for somebody from the car ahead. Another man in blue jeans with a satchel over his shoulder came and listened for a few blocks while my conductor explained. A Chinaman can never explain anything in a sentence or two; he has to go into details and go through his whole selling talk before he feels that the other has grasped the general drift of thought.

The other man bent over. He was evidently a master of English. "How muchee far you goee, mister? You payee how far you lidee."

Then I understood. When you get on you have to tell the conductor how far you are going, and he charges you for just that distance. But even after my fare was settled the natives on the car kept looking at me and pointing with their chins, as is their custom.

When I went to get off I saw several other white people piling off, but they were all from the front end of the first car. Then I looked at the markings on the car and saw what was the matter—I had been riding in the third class section with the coolies!

All the Shanghai street cars are divided up into classes—first, second and third. The white people all ride first class, the better to do Chinese second, while no one ever ventures third except the coolies.

Nature and Poetry.

Environment aids poetry, but does not create it. Nature is the grand agent in making poetry, and poetry is present wherever nature is. It sparkles on the sea, glows in the rainbow, flashes from the lightning and the star, peals in thunder, roars in the cataract and sings in the winds. Poetry is God's image reflected in nature, as in a mirror, and nature is present wherever man is.—Selected.

His Weak Point.

A man who takes a business view of things when recently asked his opinion of a person of quite a poetic temperament replied:

"Oh, he's one of those men who have soarings after the infinite and divings after the unfathomable, but who never pay cash!"

Something Else.

"Is loving a verb?"

"No; it's just plain nonsense."

Having made this reply to his daughter's question, Mr. Grouch looked a few daggers.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Laughing cheerfulness throws sunlight on all the paths of life.—Richter.

Justice Hughes Talks But Said Not a Word of Political Prospects

New York—Justice Charles E. Hughes, of the Supreme Court of the United States, came to New York yesterday as the guest of the New York State Bar Association, which is holding its thirty-ninth annual meeting in this city. In the evening at the Astor Hotel he delivered a scholarly address before that body on the topic, "Some Aspects of the Development of American Law." Then he shook hands with several hundreds of the members of the association and their friends, turned around and went right back again to the seclusion of the Supreme Court Chamber in Washington.

If Mr. Hughes said one word to anybody about that paramount topic—the possibility of his leading a reunited republican party in the coming Presidential campaign—the name of his confident has escaped discovery. There was a reception after the address, and the learned jurist, who is now pretty generally regarded by republicans and progressives alike as "the only can who can beat Wilson," had a smile and a pleasant word for scores of old friends, who greeter him in the city where he once conducted a great life insurance investigation and from which he went to the Gubernatorial chair in Albany. But to nobody was one word vouchsafed to indicate whether he would accept a nomination for the Presidency.

In fact, Mr. Hughes escaped some annoyance by having it announced in his behalf in advance that newspaper reporters would save no little lost motion by not attempting to interview him at all on any topic whatsoever, as he was coming to New York to deliver an address and was then going back immediately, without having anything additional to say.

After Justice Hughes had delivered his address, which was frequently punctuated by applause by the twelve hundred peosonr who heard him, he held an informal reception, shaking hands with not less than a thousand members and guests of the Bar Association, the great majority of whom were lawyers from all parts of the State.

In the van of the line that moved slowly past the Justice for more than an hour was William Barnes, Jr., of Albany, field marshay of that portion of ther epublican army known as the Old Guard. Mr. Barnes grasped the hand of the famous jurist cordially, spoke a few whispered words smilingly and passed on, Justice Hughes returning theg reeting with seeming warmth.

THE QUIRK TODAY "THE RED CIRCLE"

The poening episode of this great serial of Heredity, Romance, and Humanity, featuring Ruth Roland, assisted by an excellent cast, including Frank Mayo, starts today.

"Circle" Jim Borden branded by the Red Circle on his right hand the mark of the criminal Borden clan, is released from prison after serving his third term. He is met by June Travis and her mother as he leaves the gray walls of the jail. They offer him money, being interested in the reform of ex-convicts, but he turms on them savagely. Max Lamar, a young detective, standing nearby ready to carry out his instructions to shadow Borden, interferes and orders the criminal to be on his way.

Shortly afterward, Borden sees his son lift the watch from a man's pocket and determines to kill him and himself, and thus end the criminal strain of the family. Lamar has taken up the chase and reaches Borden's room in time to learn that the last of the Bordens is dead.

The next day, Lamar, while standing beside a curtained automobile, is astounded to see a woman's hand come from beneath the curtains and on its back—the red circle. When he recovers from his surprise the autc is moving away, but he has noted the license number. Interesting developments follow in the next episode. It is called Pity the Poor.

PARTY TOOK SLEIGH RIDE BY FOOT

Last night thirty-five couples from this city took a sleigh-ride, mainly by foot, to Volney Center. The merry-makers insisted on sleigh-riding in spite of the fact there is no sleighing.

After arriving at the objective point a supper refreshed the party and they then "tripped the light fantastic" until a late ,or rather, early hour.

Mr. and Mrs. George Moore acted as the chaperoning element for the party.

FORMER RESIDENT'S BODY BROUGHT HERE FOR BURIAL

The body of Mrs. Mary McGann, 62, a resident of Auburn, N. Y., who died Monday, was brought to this city yesterday and taken to Mt. Adnah cemetery for burial.

Mrs. McGann at one time resided in this city. She is survived by three daughters, Mrs. Mattie Nolan and Mrs. Sadie St. Clair of Auburn, and Mrs. Eva Kennedy, of Binghamton; and one son, Edward McGann, of Waterloo.

JERSEY JUDGE LEADS TRENTON "TRAIL HITTERS"

Trenton, N. J.—Billy Sunday passed the crisis last night of his Trenton campaign. Hundreds "hit the trail."

They were led by Federal Judge John Relistab, John E. Gill, president of the Chamber of Commerce; CharlesH. Dreshman, secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the Rev. William M. Curry, pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian church.

Many of the "trail hitters" like those named were active church members who were renewing their stand for Christ. There were scores, however, who joined the cause for the first time.

The situation here is the most extraordinary Billy has met in the twenty years he has been preaching the Gospel. Last night the Tabernacle was filled with 13,000 persons, but only 65 came down the sawdust covered aisles to grasp his hand.

HIT THE FULTON TRAIL WEEK--JAN. 24 to 28

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

HIT THE FULTON TRAIL WEEK, under the auspices of the Chamber of Commerce will be held from January 24-28th (incl).

It is the intention of the Chamber to hold meetings all over the city and to have the different clubs and societies addressed to get the people of FULTON to see the importance of backing each other up and to get cooperation of all classes. No collections will be held; no money will be asked for any cause. A committee of twenty seven men and women has been appointed to look after the detail work. Program will be announced in a few days.

Meeting of the members of the Chamber of Commerce will be held at the Public Library on Friday evening at 8 o'clock, January 21st, 1916. Very interesting things will be discussed and certain matters will be placed before the members that need the immediate attention.

* * *

A lunch will be served at the members meeting and no charges will be made. Here is the chance of a lifetime again to come out and listen to what we have to say and to file with us your criticism and to ask us questions.

* * *

Come out in the open and tell us what you think we ought to do and also suggest a few things. We don't know it all.

* * *

If you are a good citizen of FULTON then you should make up your mind NOW to be present at the members meeting on Friday evening at 8 o'clock.

* * *

We are looking forward to good times in FULTON for this year, but these times can be made still better, if you will help us.

* * *

The Hit the Fulton Trail Week is something NEVER tried before by any commercial organization in the Country and it should therefore be very interesting to hear what others have to say about this and to see if the people of FULTON are willing to help the town or not. We expect to finish up with a big mass meeting on Friday evening and we have already received the assurance that almost every club in the city will assist us as much as possible. Watch the interest in FULTON grow.

* * *

The entire week will be given over to discussion about the conditions in FULTON and if you want to see your town grow then you should be present at as many meetings as you possibly can.

* * *

The manufacturers are going to be asked to give us a few minutes to speak to their employes. Already a few have advised us that they shall be glad to stop work for a short time to give us the opportunity to address their laboring men.

* * *

This week is a week of hard work and it can bem ade a huge success if the citizens will advertise it individually; it is of the very greatest importance to the manufacturers as well as to the laboringman.

* * *

Hit that FULTON trail and become interested in the doings in YOUR CITY.

What man does not alter for the better, time will alter for the worse. Remember that you are going to be given the first chance you ever had in your life in FULTON to do something collectively.

* * *

The talks that will be given during that Hit the Fulton Trail Week will come straight from the shoulder and we shall endeavor to be as plain and as outspoken as we possibly can.

* * *

We would like to see large crowds of Ladies out during that week. The women can do much for a city in certain lines that it is a shame really that they have been forgotten.

* * *

There is nothing religious or political about the Hit the Fulton Trail Week; it is a civic week and everybody should be interested.

* * *

If you love your home; if you love your wife and children then be present at some of the meetings during the week.

* * *

ALL THE TIME FULTON, NO MATTER WHAT WE DO OR WHERE WE ARE.

Suit for Damages Looms Up Before Health Officer

In the opinion of Dr. A. L. Hall, Health officer, this city may have cause for action against the State of New York, in the sum of $1,000,000. The officials solicitude is based upon the reported contamination of the water supply, the result of barge canal operations. Dr. Hall's recommendation was read to the Board of Works at last night's session, and is in a measure based upon the natural assumption, that owing to the level of the river being raised water overflows into certain of the city's springs.

Commissioner H. P. Allen offered a resolution which authorizes City Attorney Hillick to work in conjunction with Engineer Hill in making an investigation, and to request the State Board of Health to analyze the water in certain of the springs.

The cover on the Osgood spring is badly decayed, says Dr. Hall's report, there is immediate danger of children breaking through the defective covering. Engineer Hill informed the board that in two instances new covers have been placed over springs and that they are constructed of steel. He recommends that a similar replacement be made on the Osgood spring.

Many demands are being made on the lone $900 appropriated for sewer improvements during this year. A delegation of about six property owners residing in Seward and Fremont sts., in the northeastern part of the city, made known the bad sanitary conditions existing in their respective neighborhood, due to the absence of sewers. The spokesman of the delegation asked the board to con-

City Loses Industry Employing Upwards of 50 Men and Women

The Spanswick Manufacturing company, which had its inception in this city five years ago with one employe and employing at the present time fifty-odd hands, mostly women, in the factory situated in Erie st., is to remove to another city at once.

This statement was made today by W. H. Spanswick, president of the company. The decision was reached at a meeting of the stockholders in the Erie st. factory building and was not unexpected, owing to the fact that offers of financial backing, storage facilities, etc., had been made as an inducement to the company to remove to another city, where most of the out-of-town stockholders reside, and which contains a number of other similar factories. Readiness in acquiring additional help in the other city is one of the important items which influenced the officers' action.

The local owners of the company stock who have been vigorously combating the proposition to remove the factory from this city requested that action be deferred for twenty-four hourse, during which time a busy effort will be made to secure the needs of the company in this city.

With the prosperity wave sweeping all over the country, the Spanswick Knitting company, with a daily output of 200 dozen garments, has sought to increase its capacity to four or five hundred dozens, for which there would be no difficulty in finding a market. To do this, more capital was needed but could not be secured here. With the announcement coming from the out-of-town stockholders, practically all of whom reside in one city, to the effect that their city could meet the needs of the company, an earnest effort was made by the local stockholders to interest local capital so that the plant could be kept here. The work was in vain and Fulton loses an industry.

"Trail Hitting" to Draw Attention of Entire Country

Next week one of the most unique features in civic work will be on foot in Fulton. Under the supervision of the local Chamber of Commerce a week's campaign will be held for Fulton trail-hitters. Secretary Hollenga of the Chamber of Commerce will emulate Billy Sunday with the exception that his talks will not bear upon religious topics but will bear distinctly upon Fulton and her people, their rights, privileges and duties as citizens. All classes of people will be reached by the campaign workers. The working-man and woman will share equally in the big plan with the manufacturers, merchant or professional man.

When Secretary Hollenga was this morning asked regarding the plan, he stated a committee of twenty-seven persons chosen to represent the various organizations and clubs in the city, will assist him in the work. An average of six speeches daily will be made in various parts of the city. Manufacturing establishments, club houses, lodge rooms, and even street corners will be used as meeting places. The specific places for each day, and the hour, it was stated would be announced later.

"These talks," said Mr. Hollenga, "will not be of a political nor a religious nature. Plain talk relative to Fulton, straight from the shoulder, will be the order of the week, and every class of persons in the city will have a fair show."

The plan of the campaign for trail hitters in civic work is decidedly out of the ordinary and should receive widespread attention. Mr. Hollenga in making his survey of Fulton for the Chamber of Commerce found the germ of indifference and disloyalty toward Fulton one of the greatest bugaboos handicapping our city. The quickest way to overcome the difficulty seemed to lay in a Rous-mitem campaign, hence the inaugurating of a campaign week for Fulton trail-hitters.

Secretary Hollenga is a forceful, witty speaker. He makes folks laugh at themselves when they see themselves "as what they ain't." The series of meetings arranged give promise for one of the biggest, merriest times Fulton has ever seen.

A meeting for the members of the Chamber of Commerce will be held Friday vening in the auditorium of the public library at 8 o'clock.

French and British Land at Corinth

London—A despatch from Amsterda mto the Exchange Telegraph company says that French and British troops have been landed at Corinth, Greece ,forty-eight miles west of Athens.

The message says that, according to information received at Amsterdam from Sofia, the allied troops which landed, at Phaleron re-embarked after a short inspection of the city.

"Among the wild rumors as to the intentions of the Allies," the message continues, "is the statement that they intend to advance to Athens, whence King Constantine, his court and the government will retire in conformity with the King's desire to maintain armed neutrality.

"In Sofia despatches the question is asked what Mr. Venizelos will do in that event; whether he will proclaim a republic and whether the army will side with him. These reports are said to have occasioned undiskuised alarm at the Bulgarian capital."

DON'T WORRY INTO THE GRIP

The newspapers are full of the destructive sweep of the grip and kindly offer advice how to avoid or cure it. We beg leave to offer some original and independent advice, based on something more than 150 years of experience as a newspaper. The advice is, "forget it." One of the best ways to get any lurking desirous ailment is to think you have got it. It'll usually oblige. Get nervous and worryful and await with anxiety the arrival of theg rip and you can depend upon its joining you before long. Read twice over the most of the advice as to prevention and you will note that it is applicable to practically all diseases in effect and condensed, it reads, "Keep well." Walk, breathe fresh air. be moderate in diet, sleep well these and similar injunctions are to ward off grip, but they will ward off grop, but they will ward off ward off the great majority of the sickness that visit us. Above all, "Don't worry."—Hartford (Conn.) Courant.

MISSADDAMS AND PACIFICISM

Miss Jane Addams, who has been in Washington pleading with congressmen against preparedness, has aroused admiration in at least one breast. Oswald G. Villard, who is acting as the Washington correspondent of his newspaper, the New York Evening Post, has been impressed to such an extent that he expresses the conviction that if Mr. Ford had selected her as his principal advisor instead of Madame Schwimmer his peace project would have stood a fair chance of being successful. Miss Addams advocates "establishing an official or unofficial neutral conference to sit somewhere in Holland or Switzerland and be a clearing housef or the exhange of opinions as to what might be possible peace terms." The assumption that there is need of a "clearing house" for peace purposes will make it clear to many that Miss Addams's ideas on the subject of peace are not much more practical than those of Mr. Ford. All of the belligerents possess ample machinery with which to agitate the matter of peace when their minds once turn in that direction. A committee of Americans, sitting in Holland or Switzerland, meddling in matters which will tax the genius of the greatest statesmen now living, would be a source of peril and irritation to their involuntary hosts, and they would stand an excellent chance of being told to go home.—Rochester Chronicle-Democrat.

ELIMINATE SELFISHNESS

It is only the selfish man who fails to enjoy giving for the benefit and happiness of others. We all like to witness the joy of others who receive the benefits of some one's liberality, and when we see a movement of a set of people toward an object that will bring good things to a great number of people, how quick are we to say, Why doesn't the rich man of the community come forward with enough cash to finance the project? And again, how many of us desire at times to push along a proposition for the good of the community by becoming sponsors for the plan. Most of us like to give of our mite to help along a good thing in our town, but after all, why should a lavish hand spread benefactions in a community when the object to be attained is for the common good of the people. It is a lot better to place in the hands of deserving ones the tools by whose use the workers may secure for themselves the product of their toil.

During many months in the past it has been a favorite pastime of good people to spend some time each week in yearning for the realization of a boys' club and later, a Symphony Orchestra. The one project is shelved, and the second is bearing fruit. Best of all, the orchestra is, figuratively speaking, standing upon its own legs. There are men who would like to give it a shove, sending it over the rough places with a rush; but they desist, in the belief that if a good thing is worth while, it should not be spoiled by subsidizing. If the people want to hear and learn good music, they should be willing to pay a nominal price to get what they want; and, if they will not allow themselves to be worked up to a musical pitch, then desire to improve their conditions and surroundings is little short of criminal, and the quicker they are made to feel the sting the better for all hands concerned.

Most of us would like to see this city have a boys' club established, but who among us believes that the boys should not have a hand in the making of a home. Why should the boys of Fulton be encouraged in selfishness? Why should they not take enjoyment in seeing the workings of a plan to bring about the club? A lot could be done to make life in this town worth living, but what we need is a lot of the boosting that will help us to help ourselves. The way to get a boys' club is to emulate the example of our musicians—get busy.

A MORRIS PLAN BANK IN ALBANY

The Albany advocates of the Morris Plan bank indicate that they are highly gratified by the response which has come since this new and worthy form of aiding the small borrower with good character as the basis of his credit, was inaugurated in that city. There are scores of these banks throughout the United States at the present time, and they are spreading.

In Albany a Morris Plan bank, which makes loans at six per cent. and requires payments weekly without demanding security beyond the endorsement of a note by two responsible persons, was started last August. In December it made 164 loans and in the five months of operation loaned $70,000 to 702 applicants. The average size of thel oans for December was $89.35.

The loans for December furnish an interesting study of credit conditions among very small borrowers. The report says:

"The total amount loaned in December was $14,640, which is not quite so large as in October, $15,175, but is greater than the total of any other month. The largest loan was $500; there was one of $400, three of $300 each, one of $250, 10 of $20, eight of $150, 47 of $100, three of $75, 78 of $50 and 11 of $25. Thus 125 loans were in sums of $100 and $50.

"There were 147 men among the borrowers and 17 women. Their average weekly income is $19.73, the lowest yet reported. Of the borrowers, 116 are married, 79 support 198 children, and 110 have other persons dependent on them. The 164 therefore represent a much larger number of persons benefitted; a total of 480 persons have felt in some degree the effect of the distribution of $14,-65.0 The reason given for borrowing are many although much along the usual lines except that 19 loans went for Christmas presents. Household and personal expenses account for 29 loans, debts for 22, illness for 19, business expansion for 22, rent, interest and taxes for 15, insurance and real estate improvements, 12 education, deaths, vacations, dentistry, etc., for the rest.

"The positions of the borrowers are interesting. There are 30 proprietors, 17 clerks, four federal employes, 12 employes of the state and 10 of the city and county, 16 United Traction motormen and conductors, two managers, one secretary, three agents, one inspector, three salesmen, 7 factory operatives, four machinists, one tailor, one barber, eight artisans, eight printers, two express company men, three accountants, two railway brakemen, five housekeepers and 24 miscellaneous callings.

"Classified by occupation, railroad men lead, numbering 25 and when to that 19 railway men are added, transportation is far in the lead. There are 20 government employes, 18 in manufacturing pursuits, the rest scattering."

While the banks established thus far attract notice by their semiphilanthropic character and charge only six per cent. on loans their general business yields a return of eight per cent. to the stockholders. One of the desirable features is the encouragement of thrift. The Morris bank having taught a borrower how to make weekly payments encourages him to keep it up after the debt has been cleared, and sells him installment certificates which bear interest up to five per cent. one form being a five per cent. bond with coupons to be clipped in January and July. They sell them in denominations of $50, $100, $500 and $1,000.—Auburn Citizen.

A NATIONAL CHILD LABOR BILL

One of the favorite ways to beat a bill restricting child labor in a state Legislature is to assemble all the manufacturers to protest against the injustice of making them compete against manufacturers of other states who may use child labor. No such specious argument can be brought against the Keating-Owen Bill now before Congress. That would practically abolish child labor in all states, by excluding from interstate commerce articles manufactured by the labor of any child under 15 who had worked more than eight hours a day, or on which any child under 15 had been employed at night.

This is a sweeping bill. It has incurred enmity. But, as Booth Tarkington recently said regarding this bit of legislation. "Two ways of looking at the child labor evil are like two ways of looking at massacre." The only thing to do with it is to make a law broad enough and drastic enough to accomplish the practical abolishment of this evil, and then to enforce it.

Fortunately the enlightened manufacturers are not arrayed against this bill any more than they have been arrayed recently against up-to-date labor legislation in the various states. They have come to realize that child labor is not cheap—that it is bad for them as well as bad for the individuals and the community. Instead of being cheap it is costly in the long run for the man who hires the children, and it is more costly for the community than modern conditions warrant. Humanitarianism jibes with economics in this case.

When handled by Representative Palmer last year this measure passed the House by a large majority. There seems no good reason why it should not have equally strong support in both branches of Congress this year.—N. Y. Tribune.

SCHOOL EFFICIENCY AND PREPAREDNESS

The bill introduced in the Assembly by Mr. Clarence F. Welsh of Albany to provide for the physical training of the boys in the public schools and also for instruction in military science is significant. It is not a subject for ridicule. The proposal deserves thought. In many of the states people are thinking about giving the school boys better physical training, and in some the boys are already receiving military training. Whether school training should be military or not is an open question, but there is no doubt that the school system could be developed so as to turn out youths better fitted for the battle of life, and with the kind of efficiency that would make them better fitted to receive military training than the average schoolboy is now.

There is a notable article on this subject by Mr. Sigmund Mendelssohn in the current number of The Educational Review. He illustrates the value of thorough school training by contrasting the German system. with the Russian. Germany has recognized that the best beginning of national preparedness is a "well organized school system that develops the child not only in mental and moral capabilities to the highest degree, but also trains it in thoroughness, close application, orderly habits, thrift and self-discipline." Russia on the other hand, long looked upon universal education with disfavor as a menace to her political, social and religious institutions. Mr. Mendelssohn shows that the children in the schools of European countries have more hours of employment than those in our schools. In Berlin the school day is six hours long, in Paris six, in London five and a half, and in New York five. His computation of the school hours of a year denotes the difference more impressively: Berlin, 1,350; Paris, 1,320; London, 1,225; New York 960. What is more, the extra hours are devoted to work that interests thec hild.

Assemblyman Welsh might eliminate the provision for military training, which ought to be given by the Federal government, from his bill and try to get it passed. There might be a great deal of opposition, but thed iscussion it would precipitate might be informing and have a wholesome effect.—N. Y. Times.

ONE MORE MISTAKE ON OLDEST ODD FELLOW

A Utica paper this morning, in speaking of the death of George H. Lewis of that city, refers to him as the oldest Odd Fellow in Central New York. It further states that Mr. Lewis was 90 years of age and had been a member of the order for more than 68 years.

Now far be it from Auburn to wish to brag or to exhibit a spirit of egotism, but it would seem but fair that Utica should be informed of her mistake, which may be seen by the following: William Lamey, who resides at No. 60 Fulton street, in this city, should he live until the first day of May, 1916, will have attained the age of 99 years, and he can boast of having been a member of the I. O. O. F. for 74 years, having united with Mohawk Valley Lodge in Schenectady in 1842. For 32 consecutive years Mr. Lamey was recording secretary of Ensenore Lodge, No. 438, in this city, retiring only two years ago on account of advancing years.—Auburn Citizen.

War Upon Pain!

Pain is a visitor to every home and usually it comes quite unexpectedly. But you are prepared for every emergency if you keep a small bottle of Sloan's Liniment handy. It is the greatest pain killer ever discovered. Simply laid on the skin—no rubbing required—it drives the pain away. It is really wonderful.

Mervin H. Soister, Berkeley, Cal. writes: "Last Saturday, after tramping around the Panama Exposition with wet feet, I came home with my neck so stiff that I couldn't turn. I applied Sloan's Liniment freely and went to bed. To my surprise, next morning the stiffness had almost disappeared, four hours after the second application I was as good as new."

SPUDS

Is the homely, but honest, potato going out or coming into its own? Those who love it, not for its artistic or food value, but for its monetary worth, are deeply concerned over a decrease in vegetable eating. Modern living conditions are blamed by those who take enough interest in the root to study its rise and fall.

The introduction of the gas stove, which makes it more costly to bake potatoes the distaste of hotel chefs who deem it a bore to wash and peel them. the increased consumption of baker's bread, all have a hand in its decline in popularity.

As for the gas stoves the potato is in the same plight as its brother, the bean. With an old wood fire in the kitchen it costs little to prepare it for the table. Six cents' worth of pork, half a cup of molasses, and a slow, steady fire were all that were required. Burning gas to bake beans raises that dish into the class of delicacies instead of staples.

The potato bin in the cellar, which used to have its place beside the coal bin, is a thing of the past. The cellar with a furnace is too warm. The grocer now deliveries potatoes a pack at a time, or in even smaller quantities.

In Germany they have found new food uses for potatoes, which have taken the place of grain, to a large extent. But Germany raises sixteen hundred million bushels a year against America's four hundred million.

The potato should come back, even if we must adopt the apple men's slogan, changing it to "eat a potato a day." Onondaga County is a great potato district. Nearly a million dollars' worth of potatoes came from its farms last year. New York State raises one-tenth of all the potatoes grown in the United States. — Post Standard.

EYES OF SAXONY ON CROWN PRINCE

Rumor Says King Frederick May Abdicate.

FEAR MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

Comparative Poverty Has Kept Divorced Wife of Ruler Quiet In Recent Years, but People Are Worried That She Will Become Active Again if Son Takes Throne.

Paris.—A rumor that King Frederick of Saxony was considering the abdication of his throne in favor of his son, Prince George, probably owes its inspiration to the festivities arranged in Dresden for the young man's twenty-third birthday anniversary on Jan. 15, coupled with the fact that for the past three years, since he became twenty, he has been gradually initiated into state affairs, more and more taking his father's place in the reception of minor committees from the council of ministers and parliament. This has been in accordance with the policy of state to take every precautionary measure possible to protect the heir to the Saxon throne and the Saxon people from the influence of Prince George's mother, the notorious ex-Crown Princess Louise, in the event of the sudden death of King Frederick and the accession of Prince George.

The Saxon government fears ex-Crown Princess Louise's baneful influence upon her son almost as much as the Prussians of a century ago feared Napoleon. She is their nightmare, and as long as Prince George remains young and without experience in the grave responsibilities of state the government is in dread of possible complications. Everything is being done to give him a full appreciation of his duty as king.

Prince George has not seen his mother for several years, since her so called "memoirs" were published. She eloped from the royal palace some years ago with his tutor, Giron, and was divorced by King Frederick, being compelled to renounce her title as crown princess, her husband conferrring upon her the title of Countess of Montignoso. The king took charge of the girl baby born to Louise after her elopement, the child being christened as the king's and given the name of Princess Anne Monique Pie, being included in the royal family and kept away from the mother entirely. Louise's later escapade in marrying an Italian pianist, Toselli, the publicity of a divorce from him and a fight for the child born of this union, with the publication of her memoirs ridiculing her husband's family, had the effect of completely alienating King Frederick and his government from her. Comparative poverty has kept her quiet in recent years.

Prince George's marriage has already received a good deal of attention by his father and the Dresden court, since it is obviously wise to see him settled down early with a prudent wife, whose influence would counteract any which his mother would attempt to exert. A few months before the war it was said that informal negotiations had been opened with the czar for an alliance between the heir to the Saxon throne and the Grand Duchess Tatiana, the czar's second daughter, who will be nineteen next May, a beautiful girl, vivacious and intelligent. This match is, of course, quite impossible now, and the prospective bride generally spoken of at this time is Princess Stephanie of Hohenzollern Sigmaringen, the daughter of Prince Karl of Hohenzollern, who is two years younger than Prince George.

DRANK WINE FOR 117 YEARS.

Italian Lady Who Never Tasted Water Outlived Twelve Children Who Did.

Rome.—Mrs. Paolina Pelligrini, who never tasted water, but always drank wine, died at San Michele recently, aged 117 years.

Her twelve children, who, according to the old lady, "were addicted to the pernicious habit of drinking water," have been dead many years.

The Standard of Service

THIS great railroad system is owned by 30,000 stockholders. It is operated by their chosen officers for the public service.

It gives employment to 150,000 workers, to whom it pays $118,780,000 annually in wages. For supplies bought from the public it pays out in addition $96,429,454. For taxes alone, $14,293,000 and in interest and dividends on stocks, bonds and other securities held by the public it distributes $43,784,000, making a total annual disbursement in which the public has a direct interest of $273,286,454.

These railroad lines and their owners, the communities they reach, the millions they serve, and the workers they employ, all have the closest mutual interests.

The more these mutual interests are understood and furthered, the greater the degree of service rendered. To be a faithful, efficient, punctual and dependable public servant, to make every branch of its service the best possible, is the ideal and standard of

"WITHIN THE LAW"

At the Quirk theatre, Thursday, January 20, "Within The Law," Bayard Veiller's tremendously successful melodrama, which ran for an entire season at the Eltinge theatre, New York City will be seen for one matinee and one night. This four-act play, which made the fame of its author in a single night, tells an absorbing story of modern conditions in New York life, and has received the public endorsement not only of the President, but of prominent men and women identified with literature, art, politics and the drama. Among those who have lent their names as a guarantee of the worth-while qualities of Mr. Veiller's up-to-date play, may be mentioned beside Woodrow Wilson, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, the Suffrage leader; Julius Harburger, sheriff of New York county; David Belasco, theatrical producer; Geo. S. ## SIGNAL TO KNOW HUSBAND.

Brother of Bridegroom, His Counterpart, Best Man at Wedding.

Brockton, Mass.—A secret identification signal was adopted by Evangelist Lacouture at his marriage to Miss Delina Harpin in order that his bride should be able to distinguish him from his twin brother, Narcisse Lacouture.

Narcisse was his brother's best man. The brothers were dressed alike, as they always have been, and their closest friends have been unable to tell them apart. At the reception Narcisse enjoyed himself thoroughly, receiving many of the osculatory congratulations from fair guests intended for his brother.

Tulle scarfs are so becoming that everyone uses them with decollete gowns. ## BELIEVES CALDER WOULD DEFEAT DAVID J. HILL

The Brooklyn Eagle says that G. W. Aldridge, the Republican leader of Monroe county, is confident in his statements that David J. Hill international lawyer and former ambassador to Germany, will be the Republican nominee for United States senator from New York. It is understood that he had already begun to carry on a quiet canvass for the nomination The Eagle points out that William Calder, of Brooklyn, former congressman, will lead Mr. Hill should the latter become a candidate, inasmuch, as Calder is much better known throughout the state and is in a better location geographically. Mr. Hill's home, Monroe county, adjoins Genesee that of James W. Wadsworth, at present a United States Senator from New York. The Eagle article says it is unlikely that the nomination would go to a man in a county adjoining that of a present United States senator.

MEXICAN SPIRIT INVADED HEADQUARTERS

A situation which breathed an international atmosphere, involving a migrator from the British Isles, a hyphenated American, and a ten peso Mexican note, was straightened out by Peacemaker Alnutt in the City Hall tribunal this afternoon.

Walter Burch, a recent arrival in this country, in a neighborly exhange of overcoats with Earl Ouderkirk, both of whom live in Granby, accepted the Mexican note (it is not known whether the note was issued in the Diaz, Huerta, Villa, or Carranza regime) and Ouderkirk's coat in exchange for his costly fur overcoat, but after discovering the nature of the money, repented the deal. In the review which took place in the downtown section, Officer Alnutt's presence was necessary.

The matter was settled in an orderly way when a re-transfer was made.

GIRLS PLAY BASKET BALL

Fifteen Girls Represent the Number of Local Players ---To Play at Mexico Soon.

Elizbeth Royce, who is acting as temporary manager of the High School girls' basketball team announces that games have been scheduled with Solvay High school and Mexico High. The former will be played on February 18th and the latter on March 24th on the City Hall Court in this city.

Of a squad consisting of Margaret and Elizabeth Howe, Harvia Wilson, Fannie Perry, Eva Wells, Sarah Dickenson, Ruth Nipper, Florence Furness, Natalie Butts, Thelma Parker, Gertrude Holmes, Wohneta Beebe, Marion Goodjon and Helen Waugh, the team which is to represent the high school in a game with Mexico High school girls' team in that city on Friday, January 28th, was chosen. Margaret Howe and Natalie Butts will play the forward positions, Elizabeth Royce and Florence Furness, the guards, and Elizabeth Howe will occupy the center position. Ethel Wells and Sarah Dickenson are the substitutes.

About fifteen girls, ranging in age from 13 to 15, have been practicing steadily at the City Hall twice a week under the instruction of Marion Dickerman. who is coaching the team and teaching the girls the rudiments of the game. It was at first intended to organize the players into an association, with Natalie Butts as president, but this idea has been superseded by the organization of a representative team, for which a manager and captain will soon be elected. The girls are all juniors and sophomore students.

Miss Dickerman stated last night after the first team and subs had scrimmaged for awhile that an effort would be made to book games with other girl teams. East Syracuse High, Solvay High, Mynderse Academy, of Seneca Falls and several other Central New York institutions are known to have good teams.

Of the representative five, the two Howe sisters and Natalie Butts play a star game. During the scrimmage at the City Hall court last night, baskets were scored very frequently, which is unusual in games between girls' teams. On January 14th, the East Syracuse girls in a thirty minute game with the Mynderse Academy five at Seneca Falls scored but two baskets during the entire session.

PRICE OF SHOES MAY SOON RISE

An Auburn. manufacturer of shoes reports after a trip to Boston that the stringency in the shoe market is likely to result in a rise in the retail price before the year is over. if not sooner.

"The wholesale price of shoes has advanced very materially," said the Auburn man, "particularly on certain kinds. Colt leather, from which most of the patent leathers are made, is soaring in price, due to the suspension of imports from Russia, where much of the colt leather comes from. In parts of that country the people eat horse meat, and many colts are killed for their flesh and hides. That is the source of a great deal of our material for patent leathers.

"Another factor is the lack of dyestuffs. All leather for shoes, even tan shoes, must be dyed, and the shortage of dyestuffs is ascribed by the manufacturers as one of the principal reasons for the stringency in the shoe market. Then ,too, importations from South America are virtually cut off owing to the lack of shipping facilities. There are plenty of hides in South America, It is said, if we could get them: but the manufacturers say they aren't getting them.

"Probably these stories may be dis counted to some extent; but the fact remains that importations are curtailed, and at any rate the wholesale price of shoes is going up rapidly. At the same time the demand for shoes is greater than ever before."

TABERNACLE MEETINGS HELD IN PHOENIX

The tabernacle meetings, under the charge of Rev. C. E. and Mrs. Hillis, are now being held every evening, Monday excepted, in the ample and comfortable tabernacle, erected last week on the grounds of the Baptist church. The music directed by Mrs. Hillis, with Mr. W. F. S. Yates at the piano, and with an orchestra of wind and string instruments, and a chorus of eight voices is really fine. Mr. Hillis is a forceful and impressive preacher. Visitors are heartily welcome.

COLLEGE MEN FAIL IN QUIZ ON WAR

Test Shows Students Are Ignorant of Current Events.

MANY LUDICROUS ANSWERS

Examinations In Three Institutions Result In College Authorities Seeking Corrective Measures to Overcome Deficiency—Believe Students Are Indifferent to European Affairs.

New York.—Whether the ignorance of the college student of today is representative of a growing indifference on the part of the American public toward events, persons and places intimately associated with the European war is a question which college and university authorities are investigating as a result of examinations recently held under the auspices of three representative institutions. As an immediate result of the recent quiz on contemporaneous events conducted at New York university, where an average grade of 58 per cent was the rating shown by fifty-nine students, several members of the faculty are looking for corrective measures to overcome this deficiency.

It was stated by a member of the department of history at the New York university that he believed the apparent indifference of students toward the present war was indicative of a general tendency on the part of the public to neglect a close study of affairs in Europe. That the surprising lack of information of affairs immediately connected with the war was not peculiar to students at any university was further expressed as the opinion of Professor A. H. Nason, assistant professor of English at New York university. Professor Nason, who submitted twenty-one questions to students in his various classes, pointed out that the questions used have also been submitted to students of two other institutions—a middle western state university and Bowdoin college—where the results were about the same.

Dean Kenneth C. M. Sills of Bowdoin college is quoted as saying, "I do not think college men of New England colleges are very steady newspaper readers," and referred to the matter as "lamentable, but not surprising."

Some of the questions asked by authorities at both Bowdoin college and New York university received answers which in many cases were ludicrous. At Bowdoin out of a class of fifty-three students twenty were ignorant as to the location of Gallipoli, which in many cases was put variously in Italy, France, Bulgaria, Greece and Berlin. New York university students answered the same question with apparently as little accuracy.

The French General Joffre was variously designated by students at both institutions as "Joffree," "Joffery," "Geoffrey" and "Jeofrey," indicating a general unfamiliarity with even newspaper headlines. The question, "Who is Venizelos?" resulted in similarly ridiculous answers. Some recollected the ex-premier of Greece as a Spanish artist, another said that he was a Mexican rebel, while still another designated him as the premier of Italy. When asked "Who is the present ruler of England?" several students replied variously King Edward, George III., IV. or VI. as the correct information.

In the department of history at New York university Assistant Professor Theodore F. Jones submitted current questions to a class of students in European history, among which was the query, "Where is Christiania?" Only two students knew its location, in spite of the fact that the daily papers of the day before all contained long accounts of the landing of the Ford party at that city. One student of the same class half seriously answered the question, "Who is Sir Douglas Hague?" by stating that he would answer the question correctly if told where the other "Haig" was.

Of the fifty-nine students taking the examination at New York university none answered all of the inquiries correctly, while only three obtained a grade above 90 per cent. Of a class of twenty-three freshmen nine failed, while the average rank was 63 per cent. Another class of the same number of freshmen averaged only 52 per cent, and thirteen failed to pass, while a class made up of upper class men did as poorly and averaged a grade of only 61 per cent.

Hymera, Ind.—Thomas Bond Buchanan, aged forty-five, a wealthy farmer of Petersburg, Va., advertised for a wife, and he found one.

After a few months of courtship by mail he came here to see his sweetheart. Each was pleased with the other's manner and appearance, and they were married. The bride was Jennie Stewart, aged forty-three.

THOUSANDS AWAITING GIRL

Child Was Lost When Her Grandparents Willed Money to Her.

Spokane, Wash.—Somewhere in the inland empire is a little girl between eleven and twelve years of age for whom thousands of dollars are waiting. A widespread search is now being made by Mrs. Lena Johnson of Elmia, Ida., a distant relative, who has the fortune in trust.

Disowned by her own parents, the mother took the girl when a baby to Mrs. Johnson, who was a relative, and asked her to find a home for the child. Mrs. Johnson brought the baby to Spokane in 1904. A few weeks later a home was found by Dr. Mary Latham, who was then head of the Spokane Children's Home society. The home was that of a farmer living somewhere near Spokane. A year later all of the records of the society were destroyed by fire.

In their old age the parents of the mother of the little girl repented of their attitude against their daughter, and when they died some time ago their will showed that all of their money had been left to the granddaughter.

WIRELESS LINKS TWO OCEANS

Battleship In the Atlantic Talks to Another In Pacific.

Washington.—Secretary of the Navy Daniels announced that for the first time a wireless message had been successfully transmitted from a naval vessel in the Atlantic to one in the Pacific.

The experiment was successfully tried when the battleship Wyoming, off Cape Henry, Va., exchanged messages with Admiral Cameron McR. Winslow, commander in chief of the Pacific fleet, on board the cruiser San Diego in Guaymas harbor, west coast of Mexico. The messages were easily deciphered. By air line Guaymas is approximately 2,000 miles from Cape Henry.

FEW DIE IN KANSAS BECAUSE IT'S "DRY"

Lowest Death Rate of Any State Explained by Statistician.

Topeka, Kan.—"Kansas, with a rate of 9.8 in each 1,000 population, has the lowest death rate of any state in the Union, because the people do not drink liquor, because they have money enough to live right and because they have the intelligence to read of the conditions that make for short lives and know how to dodge them."

That is the answer of W. J. V. Deacon, registrar of the Kansas vital statistics bureau, to Samuel L. Rogers, director of the United States bureau of the census. The government official wrote to Mr. Deacon to get an explanation of why the Kansas death rate is so low. In reply Mr. Deacon wrote:

"Kansas is almost wholly an agricultural state; there are only twelve cities in the state of more than 100,000 population, and there is a gratifying absence of slum districts in the cities. Aside from the southeast corner of the state there is no mining.

"The density of the population in the state is only 20.7 persons to the square mile, and 70.8 per cent of the population reside outside of towns of 2,500 population or more. The climate, while showing extremes of temperature, is usually mild enough to permit much outdoor work and open windows.

"But it is to the people themselves that we must look for those minor and subtle qualities that make for better and longer living. Kansas is rich, her per capita wealth is great and the people are enabled to live well, to clothe themselves properly, to have comfortable homes and to load their tables with nourishing foods.

"Kansas is a prohibition state, and in Kansas prohibition really prohibits. I do not mean by this that there is no alcohol consumed in the state, but the absence of the saloon means much to our growing young men, who in the absence of the barroom find more healthful pastimes than loafing in an alcohol laden atmosphere."

TWELVE MEALS EACH DAY.

Surgeons Made a Stomach For Arnold Smaller Than a Tennis Ball.

Baltimore.—Surgeons connected with the University hospital are much interested in an operation performed several days ago, when a large portion of the stomach of Harold B. Arnold was removed and a new digestive organ formed from the unaffected tissues, slightly smaller than the ordinary tennis ball, was put in its place.

His condition is now greatly improved, and he receives predigested food through a glass tube.

In the event of the complete recovery of Arnold he will have to receive nourishment at least a dozen times a day because of the minuteness of his stomach. It is so small now that it will only contain the amount of liquid held by an ordinary teacup.

TO GIVE HOSPITALS IN EVENT OF WAR

Two Institutions Are Pledged by Mrs. E. T. Stotesbury.

WILL CARE FOR 200 PATIENTS

Pledge Has Been Made Through Pennsylvania Women's Division For National Preparedness, Recently Organized In Philadelphia—Fourth Offer of Emergency Hospitals Made.

Philadelphia.—Two hospitals, one in the city and one in the country, with a combined capacity of two hundred patients, have been pledged by Mrs. E. T. Stotesbury for public use in the event of invasion or national calamity.

The pledge has been made through the Pennsylvania Women's Division For National Preparedness, recently organized here. It is the fourth offer of emergency hospitals to be made to this organization in the last few weeks, Mrs. Archibald Barklie, Mrs. Alexander Van Rensselaer and Mrs. J. Gardner Cassatt having offered the use of their homes to the division.

In a letter to Mrs. George W. Childs Drexel, chairman of the division, Mrs. Stotesbury said: "I will gladly give a unit and would choose as my particular field of responsibility a hospital in town and one in the country. I think I could safely undertake the responsibility of caring for 200 patients, so put me down for that and whatever expense it would entail. I would rather undertake indoor duties than to run a motor."

Dr. Clara Marshall, dean of the Women's Medical college, has made arrangements by which women so desiring it may be trained in the work of first aid, diet cooking and other adjuncts to hospital work. This training will be carried on without expense to the women desiring to take it up.

Mrs. E. T. Stotesbury was formerly Mrs. Oliver Cromwell of Washington and was married to Mr. Stotesbury in January, 1912, with impressive services which were attended by a number of notables. Her first husband was a prominent yachtsman and died in December, 1909.

For years she had been prominently identified with society life in the capital and also with its philanthropic enterprises. Her taste in this work is shared by her husband, who is a sponsor for several social and civic movements in Philadelphia, where he is at the head of Drexel & Co., the Philadelphia connection with J. P. Morgan & Co.

Mr. Stotesbury is a great lover of painting. It was through him that Oscar Hammerstein was induced to build the Philadelphia Opera House. He holds a directorship in a score of corporations and is an exhibitor at both the Philadelphia and New York horse shows, being fond of all outdoor sports.

MARINES RESPECTED ANTHEM

But Were Forcibly Ejected From Theater When They Stood Up.

Washington.—Because they insisted on standing up while the "Star Spangled Banner" was being played and refused to sit down when ordered to do so by persons in the rear two privates of the United States marine corps, in full uniform, were forcibly ejected from a local motion picture theater.

A recent ruling by a justice of the District supreme court gives the management of a theater the right to eject patrons under similar circumstances, and no official protest by the marine corps authorities will result.

"WANT TO GO?"

Beige colored uncut corduroy develops this smart costume, a short, full skirt and a three-quarter coat, with muff, scarf, cuffs and border of seal. The loose belt and novelty buttons give a girlish finish, while the top of the button boots are "cuffed" with seal.

SO FEMININE!

How Women May Powder Their Noses Without Giving It Away.

Women are acquiring more and more the habit of pulling a powder puff from every imaginable hiding place and powdering their faces in public. It makes one conspicuous, and the average woman does not approve, but she answers that one must powder, and in this day of rush and distances she cannot always take time to freshen up in the proper way.

It is surprising, considering that the handkerchief is very often a hiding place for the powder puff, that some ingenious woman did not think of this new contrivance before. Stitched flat on the center of the handkerchief is a neat pocket-like arrangement, which acts as a receptacle for the puff. The puff may be taken out when the handkerchief is ready to be laundered. The puff in itself is odd in that it opens wide enough at the top to permit a generous supply of powder to be emptied in and fastens again with a snapper.

When one feels the need of powder the center of the handkerchief, in which reposes the puff, may be gently patted against the face, while to all outward appearances the owner has only been using her handkerchief, and likewise if only the handkerchief is desired one need not apply the center. And to add to the attractiveness of this contrivance they are to be made in many different designs, plain and embroidered, the same as handkerchiefs, and the carrier may also exercise her individual taste by replenishing the puff with her favorite face powder.

Tulle Much Used.

Great quantities of tulle are being used on evening gowns this season not only for fashioning the gown, but for trimming purposes, in wisps of draperies, scarfs and in one gown as a train. A black and gold evening frock shows a wide piece of tulle caught across the back of the frock and held with jet bracelets to the wrists.

Queer freaks are to be seen among some of the latest importations. A midnight blue taffeta coat is lined with blue serge, reversing the order of things generally. In a rose and black velvet evening coat, where the waist portion is of the lighter shade and the skirt portion of the other, the lining of satin reverses the color, the rose velvet being lined with black and the black with rose. A venetian purple evening coat is lined for a depth of eight or nine inches with a flowered and brocaded velvet ribbon, another proof of the ribbon craze.

Coffee Charlotte Russe.

Materials.—One-quarter box of gelatin, one-fourth cupful of cold black coffee, three-fourths cupful of hot coffee, one cupful of heavy cream, three-fourths cupful of sugar, yolks of three eggs, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, ladyfingers.

Utensils.—Bowls, saucepan, eggbeater, cup, spoon.

Directions.—Soak gelatin in cold coffee ten minutes. Caramelize three-fourths cupful of sugar, add three-fourths cupful of hot coffee and let stand to dissolve. Beat the yolks of eggs, add two tablespoonfuls of sugar and cook in hot coffee mixture until egg thickens. Add the soaked gelatin when dissolved; chill until mixture begins to thicken, then fold in cream whipped stiff. Put in a mold lined with ladyfingers and chill thoroughly.

SHOES, BOOTS AND SLIPPERS.

Winter Fads In Footgear Mostly Call For Matching Colors.

Shoes match or blend with the costume. For sport or practical wear high buttoned boots, with common sense heels and heavy soles, are worn. For street wear there are boots cut very high, with Cuban heels, and with afternoon and evening costumes the daintiest of footwear is worn.

With tailor made costumes very high laced boots are worn. Sometimes they are laced up the front, sometimes up the side. Skirts of tailor made suits being extremely short, the shoes are shown off to great advantage. With a dark brown suit brown suede boots are worn, with a dregs of wine suit bronze kid and with a simple morning suit Russian calf. Dressy high boots are worn with afternoon costumes. For instance, a pair of bronze kid has straps up the front, each strap being embroidered with beads in a matching shade. Another smart high shoe is of patent leather. With a very light gray costume shoes of light gray suede are worn. With a yellow and black costume shoes with vamps of patent leather and uppers of suede in yellow are worn to match the scheme. With an afternoon or dinner gown in black are worn low shoes in patent leather, ornamented with handsome buckles of cut steel, black enamel or beads.

Satin slippers of matching shade are worn with evening dresses. There are also smart slippers of cloth of silver or cloth of gold, finished with small rhinestone buckles. Some of the black and colored slippers worn with evening dresses are handsomely beaded. Black velvet slippers are seen embroidered in cut steel beads. With a skating suit of white, trimmed with fur, the boots are of white kid, and with a suit of brown the shoes are of brown kid.

Cobweb For Transit Cross Hairs.

Broken cross hairs in surveyor's transits can be replaced with spider web. The lens should be removed and the shellac cut out of the notches in which the ends of the cross hairs terminated. A length of spider silk should be carefully removed from a spider's web and mounted in the notches with thin shellac. Care should be taken that the fingers do not come in contact with the spider silk, as the acid from the human skin quickly destroys the delicate fiber.—Popular Science Monthly.

ROAST TURKEY.

Directions For Preparing the Seasonable Bird, Home Style.

A ten pound turkey is a good size for any but the smallest family. Burn off the hairs and use a brush for washing outside. Wash inside with cold salted water. Stuff, truss and place on its side on a rack in the baking pan after rubbing entire surface with salt and black pepper; also rub breast, wings and legs with a little butter mixed in flour, the two blended together until creamy. Dredge bottom of pan with a little flour, adding half a cupful of cold water to this. Put in hot oven, and when flour on the surface begins to brown reduce heat, basting every fifteen minutes with fat in pan. If this cooks away add boiling water as needed. During the cooking turn the turkey so it may brown evenly. If it cooks too fast cover with buttered paper to prevent scorching of the skin. It must be basted frequently and thoroughly to be juicy. Remove the string and skewers before serving and garnish with celery tips and rings and disks of carrots, boiled and strung on a fine wire.

A plain filling is made with dry stale breadcrumbs mixed with a tablespoonful of minced onion, the sage of butter, and salt and black pepper to taste. Drop the butter in tiny nuts through the filling, letting the two blend as they will. This produces a "dry" filling.

Designed and Copyrighted by Franklin Simon & Co., New York.

These young ladies have jolly skating suits designed, one of rose corduroy and the other a gray and black plaid shawl. The corduroy suit is cut with a middy blouse over a plaited skirt, and with it is worn a white corduroy tam and a white fox fur set. Just the right dash of color is lent the sober plaid suit by a wide scarf of black and orange stripe, while the pomponed cap itself is of burnt orange velvet. ## Easy & Practical Home Dress Making Lessons

Prepared Especially For This Newspaper by Pictorial Review

Lingerie We All Can Make.

Combination consisting of corset cover and open drawers that may be plain or in knickerbocker style.

The prohibitive prices of the best lingerie sold in smart shops, puts it beyond the reach of the average woman. Her only hope, then, lies in duplicating the models so attractively displayed in materials and trimmings that are within her income.

This charming combination consisting of corset cover and open drawers may be made of batiste trimmed with lace and embroidery, of lace flouncing or of silk crepe de Chine or washable satin. In medium size the design calls for 2⅝ yards 32-inch material. If made of flouncing, 4½ yards 27-inch trimming are needed.

The drawers are in plain or knickerbocker style, gathered to a two-piece circular yoke.

To make the corset cover the home dressmaker first closes the under-arm and shoulder seams, then hems the front. Close the center-back seam and gather the lower edge of the front and back between double "TT" perforations and 1 inch above.

For the drawers, turn hem at front edge of yoke at notches, the front being indicated by large "O" perforations, then close the center-back seam. Next, close the leg seam of drawers section as notched: center-front indicated by single large "O" and center-back by double "oo" perforation at upper edge. Stitch a narrow underfacing to position underneath drawers from upper edge in front to upper edge in back. Gather upper edge between double "TT" perforations. Sew to lower edge of yoke, notches, center-fronts and center-backs even, lapping the right front and back edges on left.

If desired in knickerbocker style, gather entire lower edge of leg: close seam of kneeband as notched, sew to lower edge of drawers, seams even. Sew yoke to lower edge of corset cover, center-fronts and center-backs even, small "o" perforation at under-arm seam.

Adjust the belt to position, lower edge over upper edge of yoke, center-fronts and center-backs even; the large "O" perforation in the belt indicates the center-front.

Pictorial Review Combination No. 6553. Sizes 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust. Price, 15 cents.

Leap Year, Hurrah!

The London Sketch of Dec. 15 contains in Phrynette's breezy letter of the week's doings an amusing account of a sketch by Barrie, given recently at Sunderland House. The playlet is entitled "The Typist's Mistake," and the mistake was none other than that of reversing the parts in the play she was copying, so that the man utters what was intended to be the lady's speeches, while the lady speaks the man's lines.

"I watched," says Phrynette, "several women, noting with joy Gladys Cooper's masterly woolngs of the coy male, and a fearful thought struck me. Perhaps that is how, after the war, we'll have to woo and win you!"

Not merely "after the war," Phrynette, nor yet "have to." Isn't this leap year? And what of the everlasting now?

"Women have had to do a lot of waiting," says Nellie L. McClung in her book "In Times Like These." * * * "Long, weary waiting. The well brought up young lady diligently prepares for marriage—makes doilies and hemstitches linen, gets her blue trunk ready and—waits. She must not appear anxious or concerned—not at all. She must just—wait. When a young man comes along and shows her any attention she may accept it, but if, after two or three years of it, he suddenly leaves her and devotes himself to some other girl she must go back and sit down beside the blue trunk again and—wait! He has merely exercised the man's right of choosing, and when he decides that he does not want her she has no grounds for complaint.

"She may see a young man to whom she feels attracted, but she must not show it by even so much as the flicker of an eyelash. Hers is the waiting part. No more crushing criticism can be made of a woman than that she is anxious to get married. It is all right for her to be passively willing, but she must not be anxious. She must wait.

"Why should not women have the same privilege as men to choose their mates? Marriage means more to a woman than to a man. She brings in a larger contribution than he; the care and upbringing of the children depend upon her faithfulness, not on his. Why should she not have the privilege of choosing?

"The time will come, we hope, when women will be economically free and mentally and spiritually independent enough to refuse to have their food paid for by men; when women will receive equal pay for equal work and have all avenues of activity open to them and will be free to choose their own mates without shame or indelicacy and when men will not be afraid of marriage because of the financial burden, but free men and free women will marry for love and together work for the sustenance of their families. It is not too ideal a thought."

A WHIFF OF SPRING.

Snow Pudding.

Three tablespoonfuls lemon juice, one teaspoonful grated lemon rind, whites of three eggs, two tablespoonfuls granulated gelatin and one cupful sugar. Soak the gelatin in two tablespoonfuls cold water ten minutes. Dissolve in the boiling water, in which the sugar is dissolved. Add the lemon juice and rind and set aside to cool. Have the whites of eggs beaten until dry, place in pan of cold water, add the gelatin very slowly, beating all the time until it begins to set. Pour into melon mold or bowl which has been rinsed with cold water, set in cold place until ready to use.

Potted Cheese.

From a pound of rich cheese cut away all the rind and with a fork mash it fine. Work into it one-quarter of a teaspoonful of cayenne, one-quarter of a teaspoonful of made mustard and from two to three tablespoonfuls of best brandy, according to the dryness of the cheese. Sufficient is needed to make it just moist enough to pack well. Work down into small jars, seal and keep in a cool place.

How to be Happy

Happiness is not only a condition of the mind but more often a condition of the body. You may learn something from the experience of Mrs. William Troute, Ilion, N. Y., who was sick for a long time from a badly disordered stomach. "I felt miserable all of the time," she writes. "I was tired and had no appetite. A friend advised me to take Chamberlain's Tablets. I did so and my appetite improved and I gained rapidly in health. Two bottles of them restored me to my former health."

GIVING UP ADVERTISING!

GOING OUT OF BUSINESS!

The last sentence is a logical deduction of the first one; but in this case, GIVING UP ADVERTISING means CREATING BUSINESS FOR FULTON MERCHANTS AND FULTON PEOPLE. With The Evening Times, Giving up advertising means refusal to accept the voluntary business of merchants located in Oswego and Syracuse. It's a case of handing back real money to the man who wants trade from Fulton.

The Times is Handing Back Real Money Every Day to Out-of-Town Merchants

Because the agreement was made in good faith and with eyes open to the seriousness of the situation. To refuse out-of-town advertising is to do something for our town—your town. We are doing more than our share of boosting for your neighbor who may be one of Fulton's merchants—and we are glad to do that much.

WE THANK THE MERCHANTS FOR THEIR APPRECIATION OF THE BIG STEP,

And we wish them the success they so richly deserve. Here is something for you, Mr. Householder, to do—KEEP YOUR EYES UPON THE MERCHANTS WHO ARE DOING THE MOST FOR THE CITY OF FULTON.

George Kleine Presents the Kleine-Edison Feature, "THE DANGER SIGNAL," at The Quirk Today.

"The Danger Signal," a Kleine photodrama, released through Kleine Edison Feature Service is to be offered at the Quirk theatre today. This is an exceptionally forceful, entertaining film and certain to please. The story it presents of a laborer's amazing rise to power, wealth and social standing is not exaggerated, but rather a true presentation of conditions prevailing in American life. Men wh today are obscure, may overnight become dominant figures in politics, or social life, If they are quick to seize opportunity, the rest is easy. "The Danger Signal" is taken from Rupert Hughes' story "Canavan, The Man Who Had His Way," which created something of a sensation in reading circles when it appeared in the Saturday Evening Post. sider the construction of a sewer in Seward st., between 6th and 7th. The Fremont st. resident, accompanied by fellow property owners, presented to the boarrd a petition, signed by the Messrs. Wilson, Ingersoll, Fitzgerald, Johnson, Pullen, Blodgett, Mahanna, and Worden, requesting that a sewer be built on Fremont st. from 6th to 8th st. The spokesman of the Fremont st. property owners stated that efforts have been made time and again to have the city install a sewer system in that neighborhood, but without success. "Several years ago," the man stated, "upon the application of just two people a sewer was constructed in Fremont st., between 4th and 6th."

Mr. Willsie made it clear to the visitors that only $900 is available for sewer work. This amount will have to take care of repairs to the present system during the year. A promise to have the City Engineer estimate the cost of building the sewer was made to the delegation.

Former City Attorney Fanning, in behalf of the Fulton Heat, Light & Power company, asked the board to grant an extension of the time limit for the extension of the ornamental lighting contract. The contract, made during the close of the last administration, stipulated February 1st as the date for the completion of the system, but owing to the failure of them anufacturers to furnish the standards, the work has been delayed, and an additional thirty days is asked for by thel ighting company.

Mr. Hillick answered Attorney Fanning's request and he advised the former official that no action would be taken until the next meeting; that in the meantime it was desired to make a careful perusal of the contract. "Can we be sure that definite action will be taken at the next meeting? If it is not and the matter drags over after February 1st, my client might be placed in an unpleasant position." Mr. Fanning said. He received a reply that definite action would be taken.

The only other business transacted at the meeting was the auditing of bills to the amount of about $100, for express charges, etc., incurred last year. Mr. Rumsey informally discussed the operation of his department, stating that one of the three sprinkling wagons was in bad condition, that the motor on the street flusher is in bad shape; that sheds to house the wagons and equipment of his department are needed, and that cheaper quarters be secured for the maintenance of the department's horse.

AL LFULTON TEAM REPAID LAST NIGHT

The All-Oswego bowling team last night repaid the All-Fulton team for decisive defeat administered in Oswego early in the season. The visitors took all three games from the locals— and all other honors.

Brandt was the best individual bowler, scoring high game of 211 and high total of 557.

The match was by no means uninteresting as the first and third games were closely contested. A large and enthusiastic crowd was present who cheered repeatedly when a particular good run was made by any of the bowlers.

PARE—LEVERE

Mr. Charles Pare, of this city, and Miss Frances Levere, were married in Oswego this morning in the French church at 7o'clock. Mr. Frank Pare was an attendant.

Mr. and Mrs. Pare left immediately for Binghamton and Oswego. In the latter city they will be the guests of Mrs. Leon Walters, formerly Miss Hazel Pare.

3 Killed Aboard the Ryndam In Accident at Sea

London—Down by the bows and with a list to starboard, the steamship Ryndam, of the Holland-America line, arrived yesterday at Gravesend under her own steam. All the passengers were reported safe. Three stokers were killed and four injured as the result of some happening after she passed the Lizard, at the entrance of th English Channel, on aJnuary 14. The nature of the attack or accident was not disclosed.

The injury to the Ryndam was first reported from Southend, at the mouth of the Thames, when it was stated that the vessel was proceeding under her own power to Grevesend, which is twenty miles below London. Further particulars were unobtainable.

Passengers who did not land at Falmouth will remain on board in accordance with official instructions, advices from Gravesend stated. It again was declared that none of thep assengers had been injured.

The accident to the Ryndam evidently occurred at some point in the English Channel. The Lizard is at the southwestern extremity of England, and Southend is in Southeastern England, so that the Ryndam must have passed around the southern end of England since January 14.

Various theories of damage from submarine torpedo attack, a floating mine, hostile gunfire or an interior explosion were advanced here; but they were admittedly only conjectures.

The Ryndam has been in service between New York and Rotterdam for several years. She is 560 feet long, of 22,070 tons displacement and has accommodations for 2,936 passengers.

The vessel has figured frequently in the news since the beginning of the war and her officers have told of many narrow escapes from mines. Upon her arrival here on November 25 Captain P. Van Den Heuvel, her master, said several floating mines had been sighted on the first day out from Falmouth. Passengers arriving on her on September 9 said a British mine sweeper had exploded a mine not more than 250 feet from the Ryndam in the English Channel.

In the early days of the war, in September, 1914, the Ryndam was seized by a British war ship and towed into Cork Harbor, but subsequently was released.

On May 26 last the Ryndam was in collison with the Joseph J. Cuneo, a freight steamship, off Nantucket Shoals. A large hole was torn in the side of the Ryndam and her passengers were transferred to the Cuneo. Several United States battle ships of the North Atlantic fleet went to the Ryndam's assistance and convoyed her safely back to New York.

ANNOUNCEMENT MADE OF A BETROTHAL

Mr .and Mrs. Theodore Boutin, of Park st., entertained 35 guests last night in honor of Miss Hazel Irene Bough. At the supper table the end of ribbons suspended from the ceiling was placed on each plate. Attached to the ribbon was a card bearing inscription: Bethrothed, Hazel Irene Bough, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Bough, of New Haven, N. Y., and William Francis Reavey.

MACCABEES ENTERTAINED IN ROYAL FASHION

The monthly "feed" was enjoyed by the Maccabee lodge last night, the menu comprising oyster soup, crackers, cheese, doughnuts and coffee. Warren S. Gardner entertained with a "speech."

Followin gthe social, the regular weekly battle, termed a "basketball game" took place. A quintet comprising Seymour, Hutchins, Boutin, Lewis and Smith oppdsed Shipman's team on which were Wallace, Wenman, B. Boutin, and Renis.

eGorge Snow "agreed" to referee the combat, for such it was, and the participants soon forgot that any such thing as a rule book existed. Lewis's team at the midnight hour was in the lead with a score of 57-1. Before the close of the first half. Shipman scored three baskets in quick succession and thereby proved to be the sensation of the game.

Partly cloudy tonight and Thursday. Probably local snow; warmer Thursday. with fresh southwest to west winds.

HIT THE FULTON TRAIL WEEK--JAN. 24 to 28

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

There have been times, when certain individuals could change the boundaries of entire countries with the stroke of a pen. These times are by no means over, but also other things happen. The City Chamberlain of our good City, Mr. Herbert W. Adkins has given us a statement of financial affairs of the City of Fulton, that is a marvelous piece of work and the Honorable Mayor of FULTON may well be proud that he appointed this young man for that particular position. The new City Administration and the Chamber of Commerce are working hand in hand to enlighten the public and we certainly hope that the Citizens will appreciate it and that they will come to their senses as to their duties towards the City of FULTON. The financial statement will be discussed at length at the members meeting Friday evening and some very interesting items will be brought to light.

Within a few weeks we hope to be able to SHOW the people of FULTON what they have and what they missed.

* * *

Mr. Herbert W. Adkins is herewith congratulated with the splendid work he has done in making that statement. The citizens ought to congratulate him also.

* * *

Here again it has been proven what cooperation means to a city. In years gone bye, none of the citizens knew what was the ACTUAL state of affairs of the City; now this is going to be different and you are going to be shown how and for what your money was spent.

* * *

The time is coming when men and women of different walks in life will take an interest in City affairs.

* * *

FULTON has been sleeping for so many years that we really ought to be glad to be able to go to work.

* * *

We announce herewith that for the last two weeks a Committee of the Chamber of Commerce has investigated the matter of the so-called removal of the Spanswick Knitting Mills; this committee has studied the question from all sides and it shall be interesting reading for the citizens when the report will be given. So different, don't you know.

* * *

Never make up your mind too quick; always wait till you have a chance to hear the other side of the story.

* * *

FULTON is a great city without a doubt; in fact it is one of the best cities in the State of New York (we challenge herewith any one to prove us that we are mistaken) but you can't get the city in its normal path again unless you pull together and work and work and work.

* * *

Let them rave; let them stand on the corners of the streets (like regular loafers); let them gossip in the houses; let them try to tear down what years of hard work and thought has built up; let them say whatever they like. . . . . . the funeral of the knocker and ignorant one will take place very soon.

* * *

We certainly appreciate the cooperation of a number of good men in the City and if the people at large knew how much time some men have given for the benefit of others, then . . . . . they would immediately try to return the compliment.

* * *

The fellow who says that he is THROUGH WITH THE TOWN and says that he will not do a thing for its welfare, is showing lack of push, brain and will fail eventually.

* * *

Come to the meeting of members Friday evening at eight in the Library.

* * *

Don't forget to be present at at least one meeting of the HIT THE FULTON TRAIL MOVEMENT.

Some men from outside of FULTON are coming here during next week to report for larger cities the HIT THE FULTON TRAIL WEEK.

Chamberlain Discovers Forced Balance of $10,400.16, Indicating Malpractice in Former Audits Paid for by Taxpayers

Does the dear taxpayer wonder why the fight made by members of the Fox administration was so bitterly waged? The answer is contained in the financial report made to the Common Council at last night's meeting. Yet the answer is not complete in the Chamberlain's report, for there is another matter coming before the people which is startling enough to arouse the most obtuse, phlegmatic and lackadaisical citizen of this or any other municipality to seeking and wreaking vengence upon the men who have perverted the wheels of government to suit their own desires. This miscarriage of government is embodied in the announcement that the list of delinquent taxpayers as furnished by former City Attorney Fanning to former City Chamberlain George Washburn is deficient in that it favors a large number of persons who are delinquent but does not bring their names to the light of day. This startling piece of news goes further, it tells that because of the omissions the notice of "sale of land for Taxes" which has been printed in local papers, thus entailing upon taxpayers an expense item of no means proportions, is null and void; and this is because the former officials refrained from making the list complete. They held back their favorites, which if added to the list as published, would have shown the people of this city that instead of a delinquent list representing less than $6,000 in unpaid taxes, there should be in all more than $11,000 advertised. The discovery made bythe new Chamberlain in this respect will necessitate the re-publication of the tax sale, involving a waste of money approximating $150.

The City Chamberlain's report to the Common Council is as follows:

To the Honorable Mayor and Common Council of the City of Fulton, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I herewith hand you a financial statement of the City of Fulton which I have prepared from the legitimate accounts in the city's books, and what data I could gather in regard to the city's financial condition.

I found the Chamberlain's books to be in balance by a forced balance of $10,400.16, which was charged to an account called to make the ledger balance.

The city's liabilities on my balance sheet are in accordance with the certificates of indebtedness of the several creditors; the assets in accordance with the true legitimate assets of the city, and the city's capial assets, property, etc.

I also found $41.59 on deposit in the Fulton Savings Bank which the city knew nothing of.

I have opened a statement of accounts in which the correct financial condition of the city is shown every morning, and which is open to the inspection of whoever may wish to see same.

There has never been an account with water rates receivable, nor sprinkling tax receivable on the books, and the tax-rolls and special assessment ledgers have heretofore been kept upon single entry principles, while the general ledger was supposed to be kept upon double entry principles.

HERBERT W. ADKINS,
City Chamberlain.

PUBLIC MARKET PLACE STAMPED WITH APPROVAL OF ADMINISTRATION

The Common Council chamber was crowded last night when Mayor Lewis called the adjourned session to order, thirty business men, members of the Chamber of Commerce, being there asking the purchase of the abandoned canal lands situated at Oneida and 1st sts.

Secretary Hollenga of the Chamber of Commerce and N. L. Whitaker, acted as spokesmen for the group. It was the recommendation of the business men that the city make purchase of the land, and that the site be immediately utilized for a public market. Mayor Lewis promised to take immediate action in the matter and he appointed a committee of nine men, in addition to the city engineer to go over the site, interview the adjacent tenants, and make a detailed report at th next meeting of the Council which will be held on January 25th. Aldermen Quirk, Baker, and McKay will represent the city on the committee, Messrs. Hollenga, Morin and J. C. O'Brien, the Chamber of Commerce, and Messrs. Foster, Gage and Redhead, the manufacturers.

In proposing the purchase of the site, Secretary Hollenga dwelt at length on the advantages which would accrue, not only to the people of the city but to the farmers as well. The arguments put forth by Mr. Hollenga and Mr. Whitaker covered in detail the reasons for the establishment of a city market. "In the first place," stated Mr. Whitaker, "the site is at the convergence of practically every road which enters the city, and a more favorable site could not be chosen; secondly, the lands have been abandoned and can be readily secured, whereas the State will hold up the sale of other parcels awaiting the action of the Legislature. And again, the committee representing the Chamber of Commerce had called on the manufacturers whose plants adjoin the abandoned lands and interviewed these people in regard to their interest in a purchase of the property for their own use. In one case, a disappointing answer resulted.

"If we were certain that any of these manufacturers desired the adjoining lands for the purpose of extending their factories and thereby making necessary the employment of more help, we would drop the idea of utilizing this site for a public market immediately." Mr. Whitaker continued, "but, in only one case, is it apparent that the abandoned land is wanted for this purpose. The Massaro Macaroni factory is that one and we have, therefore, extended our limi-

MONEY AND MORALS

The widow pension system is proving that it is a financial advantage as well as a moral force. In New York city 161 widowed mothers are given $21.55 per family and the care of their children is entrusted to them. The institutional charge for the same work work is $30. The city saves money and the mothers save the children. There have been public institutions in this state which cost per inmate more than board at a hotel. The per inmate cost of institutions is always reckoned from the standpoint of free rent and no overhead charge for improvements. The state should compel a system of bookkeeping which took into account the original investment, the improvements and the wear and tear as elements in the cost. With these items added it will be found that the cost per capita is more by far than the share of each member of a household from the average parent's income. The public's business is too often transacted from the standpoint of the jobs and places rather than with consideration for the wards. —Watertown Standard.

THE GOVERNOR "FOR" HUGHES

Not only is Justice Hughes Governor Whitman's first choice for president, but as long as the justice firmly refuses to be a candidate he will continue to be the governor's first choice. On these terms the justice will remain Colonel Roosevelt's first choice too, and the first choice of every other Republican aspirant for the presidency. It is a rare distinction that Justice Hughes has won, and he cannot help being impressed by the great popularity he has achieved.

Of course, if there should come signs that the justice was weakening in his refusal to accept a nomination that might be different. Then the governor, the colonel and all the rest of the lightning-rod holders would be compelled to give patriotic consideration to the question of permitting the United States Supreme Court to be prostituted to partisan politics.—N. Y. World.

MR. ROOT'S PATRIOTISM

Mr. Root's stirring address at the Bar Association banquet Saturday night, strongly impressed all who heard it, and will appeal with equal force to the minds and hearts of all loyal American citizens who read his words. It was a warning of the dangers which threaten our country, an appeal to all thinking persons to forget their selfish interests in an effort to re-establish the ideals upon which the Nation was founded. It was a sharp reminder to all who have forgotten the tremendous cost of the liberty we have enjoyed, of the conditions under which we obtained the peace and national prosperity which once seemed so secure. Our old isolation has vanished, the ocean is no longer a barrier, we "cannot live unto ourselves alone." We must be prepared to defend our liberty, first by force of arms against external aggression; secondly, from within against indifference and false doctrine "against all willingness to submit individual independence to the control of practical tyranny, whether it be of a monarch or a majority." The spirit of American traditions must be reawakened to expel false ideals. "Somebody must make this spirit vocal."—New York Times.

TIME TO STOP

A story has gone the rounds of the comic columns of daily newspapers whose moral is to show that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. The story is of a man, having enjoyed a prosperous business year, decided to invest some of his surplus cash in an automobile. There was joy in his household when he announced he was going to the dealer to get and bring the new car home.

When he swept up the street at a rate very closely approximating the speed limit, his wife was standing on the veranda to welcome him—also the new purchase. But to her dismay, he whizzed on by without even slackening the pace of the car.

Soon, however, he came past again, and according to the story of the wife shouted, "Say, Lizzie, phone the garage and find out—"

He was out of hearing distance and his mystified wife stood irresolute upon the veranda trying to puzzle out what it all meant. Suddenly the auto tore up the street again, and the owner thereof managed to gasp out: "Find out how to stop this darned thing and tell me when I come by again."

It is not related whether the man ran out of gasoline or whether Lizzie acquired the information. The point is quite obvious. It is quite as important to know when to stop a story affecting the life and character of a person as how to start it. Many a "practical joke" has had serious ending because the perpetrator did not know when to stop. Many a man has lost his station in life because he promised to have just one more fling at his neighbor, then to give up his unsavory tactics. Too often this one more fling of a message containing a sting is his last, and friends hasten to rescue his broken pride from the wreckage which he has brought down upon his head.

A wise politician is he that knows, before he goes into a proposition, just when and how to stop his nefarious work.

THE FALL OF MONTENEGRO

Montenegro has been scrapped for the Teutonic heap along with Belgium and Serbia. The aged Nicholas completes a trio of Kings of the Allies without a country.

The Montenegrins at the outset of the Austrian invasion made a valiant resistance; but while their force was employed upon one frontier the armies of the Hapsburg poured over the other boundaries. Their land filled with starving, homeless fugitives from Serbia, their supplies of food and ammunition exhausted and their little army left to fight alone, they were finally forced to yield to the well eqüipped, numerically superior force.

For the first time in its history Montenegro is under the heel of the conqueror. When Christian Europe erected am ilitary boundary along the Danube and the Slav against Turkish invaders, Montenegro maintained alone the inviolability of theBlack Mountains. What the Turks for five centuries failed to do their ally of today has accomplished.

What will be the fate of this little country? The wrath of the Hapsburgs has been directed especially against the Serbs and the conquest of Serbia and Montenegro has been in a measure the working out of this bitterness. Teutonic success would, no doubt, leave both shorn of the Lovcen and Novi Bazar; and Serbia of the Macedonian possession. And, judging from Austrian methods of the past, both would be Hapsburg dependencies. There may be the germ of this project in the reported plan to supplant the present house of the Karageorgevitch by an Obrenovitch, thus restoring the conditions of the days of Milan, when the doings of the Serbian Cabinet and Parliament were subject to reversal at Vienna.

Count Aehrenthal's dream was the collection of all the Serbs under the Austrian standard and eventually their formation into a third integral part of the heterogeneous monarchy. Whatever hopes there were for this plan vanished at the time of the making of the Balkan league, and it is scarcely proobable that the Austrian victors would now entertain the project as feasible for their canquished enemies.

The Hohenzollern and Hapsburg militarism has fallen heaviest upon the weakest and no small nation has escaped the sweep of its remorseless power. The Allies have been unable throughout the war to protect the weak among their numbers although they announced as one of the cardinal principles of their warfare the preservation of the integrity of small States of Europe. Aid from Italy that might have saved Montenegro failed as help had failed Belgium and Serbit, and with Italy's own perils increased by the Austrian successes there seems now little hope of Italian ability to restore Montenegro to her king and people.—N. Y. Sun.

WHAT GERMAN SUCCESS MEANS TO AMERICA AND THE REST OF THE WORLD

Py SAMUEL W. PENNYPACKER

Ex-Governor of Pennsylvania, member of the Pennsylvania Public Service Commission.

There has been much written in America concerning the European war, but unfortunately most of the productiions upon this subject, like the books of James M. Beck, of New York, and Dr. J. William White, of Philadelphia, and the lurid outbursts of Theodore Roosevelt, are simply emotional appeals based in the main upon such incidents as the overrunning of Belgium, the sinking of the Lusitania, and the punishment of Miss Cavell for aiding the enemy, while permitted within the German lines as a nurse. It is very easy to select such incidents and elaborate them. He, however, who would permit his judgment to be determined by such facts as that the Allies began the war with the assassination of a trusting and unoffending woman, that they have violated the neutrality of both China and Greece, that they have executed at least two women for military offenses, and that they have tried first to bribe, and then to bully little Greece into a ruinous war, has only lightly touched the surface and has entirely ignored the real questions and forces underlying this supreme struggle of the world's history.

Americans who are not hyphenated by being either Anglo-Americans or German-Americans, ought seriously to seek the correct solution of two fundamental queries, and to decide what result will for the future most benefit mankind, and what course of conduct will most benefit their own country.

In the outset the military policy of the Allies, which up to this time has not been very successful, was that Great Britain, France and Belgium should hold Germany at bay in the West, while Russia with her enormous masses of troops should occupy Berlin. Germany was to be crushed and thoroughly humiliated by the power and pressure of overwhelming numbers. Suppose the plan should finally succeed, how is the world to be benefited by the crushing of Germany?

It is conceded even by her foes that her people are among the most efficient, energetic and cultivated of all those upon the earth. She has shown her capacity in the events of this war as she did before in literature, science and commerce. Is it not better then, for mankind, that she should be preserved, that her methods which have proven to be useful be extended, and that her influence be expanded?

Should the Allies win, it would mean that Russia would come west in Europe. England has already promised her the possession of Constantinople as a means of reaching the Mediterranean. How is that result going to be helpful either to Europe or to the world? Russia already occupies the half of Europe and the half of Asia with more territory than she can utilize and with more people than she can provide for properly, or civilize. Does the possible substitution of the Slav and Cossack for the German promise improvement or retrogression? In truth, looking at the matter broadly and with a view to the welfare of humanity in the management of mundane affairs, there ought to be a union of all branches of the Teutonic race, Germany, Holland, England, the United States, Sweden, Norway and Denmark, for the advancement of the interests they have in common and for protection against the inroads, first of the Slav, and then of the Mongol. The English are only a tribe of Germans, who in the sixth century found their way across the North Sea to their island home. Their supreme sin in this war has been that they have proven faithless to their race and have cohabited with the heathen and the stranger in order to gain help in a household quarrel.

The sins of nations, like those of individuals, always find them out, and bitterly will England rue the day when in the hope to thwart those of her own blood who were interfering with her trade, she endeavored to increase the power of Russia and took the Mongol into her embrace. Her statesmen were purblind when they failed to see that the occupation of the centre of Europe by Germany was her protection against the oncoming of alien races from the East and the strongest bulwark for the safety of her interests and those of mankind.

In no crisis in the past have American affairs been conducted with so little good judgment. We have indicated a lack of ability to measure the trend of events and to appreciate our own interests which may be said to approach fatuity. American statesmen ought to be keenwitted enough to recognize the fact that whatever may be the courtesies extended and however strong the expressions of friendship, and however numerous millionaires among us permitted to put their lips to the hand of the King, the British are necessarily and unchangeably hostile to our advancement.

Spencer and Darwin long ago pointed out that the struggle for existence is most fierce between those species which are closely allied in blood. Britain is hostile to us because she knows that we both want the same things. She showed that hostility when she burnt our Capitol, when she sent out the Alabama and Florida to prey on our commerce, when she with Russia drove Shuster out of Persia, and when she prevailed with Mr. Wilson and Elihu Root to surrender our sovereignty over the Panama Canal. In this war by maintaining a real neutrality and indicating a proper sympathy with a sturdy and capable people, struggling for existence against seemingly overwhelming numbers of British, French, Serbians, Belgians, Italians, Russians, Algerians, Japanese and Hindoos, we might have made a friend among the nations. It would seem that the very meanness of giving support to such a combination would have been resented by American manhood. Instead it may as well be recognized that we have so managed as to retain the old rivalries of Great Britain, and to make another enemy of Germany. Professing to fear the German military spirit, we have done all that it has been possible to do to bring her wrath upon our heads. We have been boisterous in our condemnation of Germany. We have hidden out of sight and condoned the far more grievous offenses of Great Britain. In all of our history, Germany has never crossed our path. We have never made a step forward that the British have not endeavored to thwart. Let no man fail to observe that in those matters affecting ourselves where we have given blame to Germany in this war, her efforts were being directed against her enemies and the injury to us was incidental, but that on the other hand, the injuries inflicted by the British have been directed against us. The British have closed the North Sea to our commerce. They have used our flag to cover their belligerent efforts and thus given an appearance of justification for assaults upon boats sailing under our colors. They have blockaded our ports, seized our vessels and confiscated the cargoes. General Grant informed France that we would regard the hovering of belligerent men-of-war around our ports as an "unfriendly act," but we have forgotten American traditions and have become like the quack doctor in the old French play, who said, "the heart used to be on thel eft side, but all that we have changed." They and their Allies have dared to overhaul our boats in the high seas and carry away men and women found on them. We fought the war of 1812 to prevent such aggression, and some of us well remember the attitude of the British when Wilkes seized the rebel emissaries, Mason and Slidell on a British boat transporting them on their errand of destruction to American nationality. Confronted with such facts we have shown the teeth of a tiger toward Germany in her time of stress and cooed our objections to the British with our blandest notes. We have supplied the British with the means of conducting their warfare. We have been silly enough to lend them money sillyenough to lend them the money to pay for munitions they buy from us. Our press in connection with such events as the sinking of the Lusitania, and the execution of the treacherous nurse, has not hesitated to use the ugly word, "murder" in senseless fashion. Mr. Wilson notified the Americans who had been invited to Mexico and had there invested their substance and taken their families to leave the country. He has no word for those Americans who heedlessly went on board the Lusitania, and being on the vessel of a belligerent loaded with munitions of war, lost their lives. It would have been a warning given before and not after the event, and might have saved them from ther esults of their indiscretion, but he failed in his duty.

In his first note to Germany Mr. Wilson declared that submarines could not be used against the vessel of a belligerent carrying munitions of warfare, without violating international law, and, therefore, must be abandoned. In his recent message to Congress, with strange inconsistency he recommended the construction of submarines by the United States. Of what service will they be if our possible enemies may, with impunity, transport cannon and ball to destroy us by adopting the simple device of taking on board some neutral? We have been loud in our condemnation of Germany for making preparations during thel ast 40 years for her defense. Mr. Wilson has wisely recommended to Congress that in America we follow her example and do precisely the same thing.

If the British win in this war they will tighten their hold on the seas, where they even now threaten New York and our whole coast. The Cossack will be in Constantinople and perhaps in Berlin, and the Janpanese, their ally, who they have agreed must be satisfied before peace is made, will be crossing the Pacific. What good will all this do to America, even though Schwab, du Pont, and Morgan are more wealthy?

If the Germans win, then in all probability, Canada, with the Great Lakes, the St. Lawrence River and the Manitoba wheat fields, which the British wrenched from us in the Democratic days of Polk, will enter the union of the States. Canada will be unable to protect herself in any other way, and can do no otherwise. What Charles Carroll tried to accomplish during the Revolution and would have succeeded in doing, had it not been for the Canadian dislike of the Puritans of New England, will have been realized and the hope of Washington and the patriots who founded the Government be fulfilled. When that time comes, and it may come, the United States of America will occupy a continent and its representative institutions dominate will occupy a cointinent and its re- the destinies of mankind. Its system of government with this demonstration of the inefficiency of royalty which has become an anachronism, will soon be adopted by Great Britain. And we shall owe our disenthrallment upon the seas and our relief from a danger which has often threatened us in the North, not to our own foresight and endeavers, but to those of Germany.

A BUSHRANGER AT BAY.

THE HON. GUY KENTISH was trotting the globe, an exercise foreign to his habit, when he went on to Australia for a reason racy of his blood. He wished to witness a certain game of cricket between the full strength of Australia and an English team which included one or two young men of his acquaintance. It was no part of his original scheme to see anything of the country; one of the Australian cricketers put that idea into his head, and it was under inward protest that Mr. Kentish found himself smoking his chronic cigar on the Glenranald and Clear Corner coach one scorching morning in the month of February. He thought he had never seen such a howling desert in his life, and it is to be feared that in his heart he applied the same epithet to his two fellow passengers. The one outside was chatting horribly with the driver; the other had tried to chaff the Hon. Guy and had repaired in some disorder to the company of the mail bags inside. Kentish wondered whether these were the types he might expect to encounter upon the station to which he had reluctantly accepted an officious introduction. He wished himself out of the absurd little two horse coach, out of an expedition whose absurdity was on a larger scale and back again on the shady side or the two or three streets where he lived his normal life. The fare at wayside inns made the thought of his club a positive pain, and these pangs were at their sharpest when Stingaree cantered out of the scrub on his lily mare, a blessed bolt from the blue.

Mr. Kentish watched the little operation of "sticking up" without a word, but with revived interest in life. He noted the pusillanimous pallor of the driver and his friend and felt personally indebted to the desperado who had put a stop to their unpleasant conversation. The inside passenger made a yet more obsequious surrender, not that the trio were set any better example by their noble ally, who began by smiling at the whole affair and was content to the last in taking an observant interest in the bushranger's methods. These were simple and in a sense humane; there was no personal robbery at all. The mail bags were sufficient for Stingaree, who on this occasion worked alone, but led a pack horse, to which the driver and the inside passenger were compelled to strap the long canvas bags under his eyeglass and his long revolver. Few words were spoken from first to last. The Hon. Guy never put in his at all, but he watched the outlaw like a lynx without betraying an undue attention, and when all was over he gave a sigh.

"So that's Stingaree," he said more to himself than to his comrades in humiliation, but the bushranger had cantered back into the scrub, and his name opened the flood gates of a profanity which made Kentish wince for all his knowledge of the world.

"Do you never swear at him till he has gone?" he asked when he had a chance. The driver leaned across the legs of his friend.

"Not unless we want a bullet through our skulls," he answered in boorish derision, and the man between them laughed harshly.

"I thought he had never been known to shoot?"

"That's just it, mister. We don't want him to begin on us."

"Why didn't you give him a bit of your mind?" the man in the middle inquired of Kentish. "I never heard you open your gills!"

"And we expected to see some pluck from the old country," added the driver, wreaking vengeance with his lash.

Mr. Kentish produced his cigar case with an insensitive smile, and, after a moment's deliberation, handed it for the first time to his uncouth companions. "Do you want those mail bags back?" he asked, quite casually, when the three cigars were in blast.

"Want them? Of course I want them, but want must be my boss," said the driver.

"I'm not so sure," said Kentish. "When does the next coach pass this way?"

"Midnight, and I drive it. I turn back when I get to Clear Corner, you see."

"Then look out for me about this spot. I'm going to ask you to put me down."

"Put you down?"

"If you don't mind pulling up. I'm not going on at present, but I'll go back with you to Glenranald instead if you'll keep a lookout for me tonight."

Instinctively the driver put his foot upon the brake, for the request had been made with that quiet authority which this silent passenger had suddenly assumed, and yet it seemed to them such a mad demand that his companions looked at Kentish as they had not looked before. His face bore a close inspection; it was one of those which burn red, and in the redness twinkled hazel eyes that toned agreeably with a fair beard and fairer mustache. The former he had grown upon his travels, but the trail of the west end tailor, whose shooting jacket is as distinctive as his frock coat, was upon Guy Kentish from head to heels. As they watched him he took an open envelope from his pocket, scribbled a few words on a card, put that in and stuck down the flap.

"Here," said he, "is my letter of introduction to the good people at the Mazeppa station higher up. If I don't turn up tonight see that they get it, even if it costs you a bit of this?"

And putting the sovereign in a startled palm, he jumped to the ground.

"But what are you going to do, sir?" cried the driver in alarm.

"Recover your mail bags if I can."

"What? After you've just been stuck up"—

"Exactly. I hope to stick up Stingaree!"

"Then you were armed all the time?"

Mr. Kentish smiled as he shook his head.

"That's my affair, I imagine, but even so I am not fool enough to tackle such a fellow with his own weapons. No, I know what I'm doing, and I shall do better alone. Till tonight, then!"

And he was in the scrub ere they decided to take him at his madcap word, and let his blood be on the chucklehead of the new chummiest new chum that ever came out after the rain! Was it pluck or all pretense? It was rather plucky even to pretend in such proximity to the terrible Stingaree. On the whole the coaching trio were disposed to concede a certain amount of unequivocal courage, and the driver, with Kentish's sovereign in his pocket, went so far as to declare that duty alone nailed him to the box.

Meantime the Hon. Guy had skirted the road until he came to double horse tracks striking back into the bush. These he followed with the wary stealth of one who had spent his autumns at least in the right place. They led him through belts of scrub in which he trod like a cat without disturbing an avoidable branch and over treeless spaces that he crossed at a run bent double, but always as he followed the trail his shadow fell at one consistent angle, showing how the bushranger rode through his natural element as the crow might have flown overhead.

At last Kentish found himself in a sandy gully bristling with pines, through which the sunlight dripped like melted gold, and in the fine warp and woof of high light and sharp shadow the bushranger's horses stood lashing at the flies with their long tails. The bushranger himself was nowhere to be seen. But at last Kentish descried a white and brown litter on either side of the thickest trunk in sight, from whose farther side floated intermittent puffs of thin blue smoke. Kentish looked and looked again before advancing. But the tall pine threw such a shadow as should easily swallow his own. And in another minute he was peeping round the bole.

The litter on either side was of course the shower of miscellaneous postal matter from the mail bags, and in its midst sat Stingaree against the tree, enjoying his pipe and an English magazine. Kentish peered for torn envelopes and gaping packets; there were no more. The bushranger had evidently started with the magazine and was still curiously absorbed in its contents. The notorious eyeglass dangled against that kindred vanity, the spotless white jacket which he affected in summer time; the brown, attentive face, even as Kentish saw it in less than profile, was thus purged of the sinister aspect which such an appendage can impart to the most innocent, and a somewhat passive amusement was its unmistakable note. Nevertheless, the long revolver which had once more done its nefarious work still lay ready to his hand; indeed, the Hon. Guy could have stooped and whipped it up, had he been so minded.

He was absorbed, however, in the absorption of Stingaree, and as he peered audaciously over the other's shoulder he put himself in the outlaw's place. An old friend would have lurked in every cut, a friend whom it might well be a painful pleasure to meet again. There were the oval face and the short upper lip of one imperishable type; on the next page one of the magazine's fancy portraits, with lines underneath which set Stingaree incongruously humming a stave from H. M. S. Pinafore. Mr. Kentish smiled without surprise. The common folk in the omnibus opposite were the common folk of an inveterate master. There was matter for a homesick sigh in his hint of streaming streets—and Kentish thought he heard one as he held his breath. The page after that detained the reader some minutes. The illustrations proclaimed it an article on the new Savoy opera, and Stingaree confirmed the impression by humming more "Pinafore" when he came to the end. Kentish, creeping away as silently as he had come, described a circle and came noisily on the bushranger from the front. The result was that Stingaree was not startled into firing, but stopped the intruder at due distance with his revolver leveled across the open copy of the magazine.

"Now may I not come a little nearer?" asked the Hon. Guy.

"I heard you singing 'Pinafore,'" cried Kentish cheerily. "And I find you reading."

"How dare you find me?" demanded the bushranger, black with passion.

"I thought you wouldn't mind. I am perfectly innocuous—look!"

And, divesting himself of his shooting coat, he tossed it across for the other's inspection. He wore neither waistcoat nor hip pocket, and his innocence of arms was manifest when he had turned round slowly where he stood.

"Now may I not come a little nearer?" asked the Hon. Guy.

"No; keep your distance, and tell me why you have come so far. The truth, mind, or you'll be shot!"

"Very well," said Kentish. "They were dreadful people on the coach"—

"Are they waiting for you?" thundered Stingaree.

"No, they've gone on; and they think me mad."

"So you are."

"We shall see; meanwhile I prefer your company to theirs and mean to enjoy it up to the moment of my murder."

For an instant Stingaree seemed on the brink of a smile; then his dark face hardened, and he tapped the long barrel in rest between his knees.

"You may call it murder if you like," said he. "That will not prevent me from shooting you dead unless you speak the truth. You have come for something; what is it?"

"I've told you already. I was bored and disgusted. That is the truth."

"But not the whole truth," cried Stingaree. "You had some other reason."

Kentish looked down without speaking. He heard the revolver cocked.

"Come, let us have it, or I'll shoot you like the spy I believe you are."

"You may shoot me for telling you," said Kentish, with a quiet laugh and shrug.

"No; I shall not unless it turns out that you're ground bait for the police."

"That I am not," said Kentish, growing serious in his turn. "But since you insist I have come to persuade you to give up every one of these letters which you have no earthly right to touch."

Their eyes met. Stingaree's were the wider open and in an instant the less stern. He dropped his revolver, with a laugh, into its old place at his side.

"Mad or sane," said he, "I shall be under the unpleasant necessity of leaving you rather securely tied to one of these trees."

"I don't believe you will," returned Kentish without losing a shade of his rich coloring. "But in any case I suppose we may have a chat first? I give you my word that you are safe from further intrusion to the level best of my knowledge and belief. May I sit down instead of standing?"

"You may."

"We are a good many yards apart."

"You may reduce them by half. There."

"I thank you," said Kentish, seating himself tailorwise within arm's length of Stingaree's spurs. "Now, if you will feel in the breast pocket of my coat you will find a case of very fair cigars, not too strong. I shall be honored if you will help yourself and throw me one."

Stingaree took the one and handed the case with no ungrateful acknowledgment to its owner, but before Mr. Kentish could return the courtesy by proffering his cigar cutter the bushranger had produced his razor from a pocket of the white jacket and sliced off the end with that.

"So you shave every day in the wilds," remarked the other, handing his matchbox instead. "And I gave it up on my voyage."

"I alter myself from time to time," said Stingaree, as he struck a light.

"It must be a wonderful life!"

But Stingaree lit up without a word, and Kentish had the wit to do the same. They smoked in silence for some minutes. A gray ash had grown on each cigar before Kentish demanded an opinion of the brand.

"To tell you the truth," said Stingaree, "I have smoked strong trash so many years that I can scarcely taste it."

And he peered rather pathetically through his glass.

"Didn't the same apply to the magazine you were reading?"

"No; I have always read the papers when I could," said Stingaree, and suddenly he was smiling. "That's one reason why I make a specialty of sticking up the mail," he explained.

Mr. Kentish was not to be drawn into a second deliverance on the bushranging career. "Is it a good number?" he asked, nodding toward the magazine.

The bushranger picked it up.

"Good enough for me."

"What date?"

"Ninth of December."

"Nearly three months ago. I was in London then," remarked Kentish in a reflective tone.

"Really?" cried Stingaree, under his breath. His voice was as soft as the other's, but there was suppressed interest in his manner. His dark eyes were only less alight than the red cigar that he took from his teeth as he spoke. And he held it like a connoisseur, between finger and thumb, for all his ruined palate.

"I was," repeated Kentish. "I didn't sail till the middle of the month."

"To think you were in town till nearly Christmas!" and Stingaree gazed enviously. "It must be hard to realize," he added in some haste.

"Other things," replied Kentish, "are harder."

"I gather from a cartoon that the new law courts are in use at last."

"I was at the opening."

"Then you may have seen this opera that I have been reading about?"

Kentish asked what it was, although he knew.

"Iolanthe."

"Rather. I was there the first night."

"The deuce you were!" cried Stingaree, and for the next quarter of an hour this armed scoundrel, the terror of a district as large as England and Wales, talked of nothing else to the man whom he was about to bind to a tree. Was the new opera equal to its predecessors? Which were the best numbers? Did Punch do it justice, or was there some jealousy in that rival hotbed of wit and wisdom?

Unfortunately, Guy Kentish had no ear for music, but he made a clear report of the plot, could repeat some of the lord chancellor's quips, and was in decided disagreement with the captious banter from which he was given more than one extract. And in default of one of the new airs Stingaree rounded off the subject by dropping once more into—

For he might have been a Rooshian,
A French or Turk or Prooshian
  Or perhaps I-tal-i-an,
  Or perhaps I-tal-i-an!
But in spite of all temptations
To belong to other nations
  He remains an Englishman!

"I understand that might be said of both of us," remarked Kentish, looking the outlaw boldly in the eyes. "But from all accounts I should have thought you were out here before the days of Gilbert and Sullivan."

"So I was," replied Stingaree without frown or hesitation. "But you may also have heard that I am fond of music—any I can get. My only opportunities, as a rule," the bushranger continued, smiling mischievously at his cigar, "occur on the stations I have occasion to visit from time to time. On one a good lady played and sang 'Pinafore' and 'The Pirates of Penzance' to me from dewy eve to dawn. I'm bound to say I sang some of it at sight myself, and I flatter myself it helped to pass an embarrassing night rather pleasantly for all concerned. We had all hands on the place for our audience, and when I left I was formally presented with both scores, for I had simply called for horses, and horses were all I took. Only the other day I had the luck to confiscate a musical box which plays selections from 'The Pirates.' I ought to have had it with me in my swag."

So affable and even charming was the quiet voice, so evident the appreciation of the last inch of the cigar which had thawed a frozen palate and so conceivable a further softening that Guy Kentish made bolder than before. He knew what he meant to do. He knew how he meant to do it. And yet it seemed just possible there might be a gentler way.

"You don't always take things, I believe?" he hazarded.

"You mean after sticking up?"

"Yes."

"Generally, I fear; it's the whole meaning of the act," confessed Stingaree, still the dandy in tone and phrase. "But there have been exceptions," he added.

"Exactly!" quoth Kentish. "And there's going to be another this afternoon!"

Stingaree hurled the stump of his cigar into the scrub, and without a word the villain was born again, with his hard eyes, his harder mouth, his sinister scowl, his crag of a chin.

"So you come back to that!" he cried harshly. "I thought you had more sense. You will make me tie you up before your time."

"You may do exactly what you like," retorted Kentish, a galling scorn in his unaltered voice. "Only, before you do it, you may as well know who I am."

"My good sir, do you suppose I care who you are?" asked Stingaree, with an angry laugh—and his anger is the rarest thing in all his annals.

"I am quite sure you don't," responded Kentish. "But you may as well know my name, even though you never heard it before." And he gave it with a touch of triumph, not for one moment to be confounded with natural pride.

The bushranger stared him steadily in the eyes; his hand had dropped once more upon the butt of his revolver. "No, I never did hear it before," he said.

"I'm not surprised," replied the other. "I was a new member when you were turned out of the club." Stingaree's hand closed; his eyes were terrible. "And yet," continued Kentish, "the moment I saw you at close quarters in the road I recognized you as"—

"Stingaree!" cried the bushranger, on a rich and vibrant note. "Let the other name pass your lips—even here—and it's the last word that ever will!"

"Very well," said Mr. Kentish, with his unaffected shrug. "But, you see, I know all about you."

"You're the only man who does in all Australia!" exclaimed the outlaw hoarsely.

"At present! I shan't be the only man long."

"You will," said Stingaree, as he leaned over, revolver in hand. "You'll be the only man ever, because instead of tying you up I'm going to shoot you."

Kentish threw up his head in sharp contempt.

"What!" said he. "Sitting?"

Stingaree sprang to his feet in a fury. "No; I have a brace!" he cried, catching the pack horse. "You shall have the other, if it makes you happy, but you'll be a dead man all the same. I can handle these things, and I shall shoot to kill!"

"Then it's all up with you," said Kentish, rising slowly in his turn.

"All up with me? What the devil do you mean?"

"Unless I am at a certain place by a certain time, with or without these letters that are not yours, another letter will be opened."

Stingaree's stare gradually changed into a smile.

"A little vague," said he, "don't you think?"

"It shall be as plain as you please. The letter I mean was scribbled on the coach before I got down. It will only be opened if I don't return. It contains the name you can't bear to hear!"

There was a pause. The afternoon sun was sinking with southern precipitancy, and Kentish had got his back to it by cool intent. He studied the play of suppressed mortification and strenuous philosophy in the swarthy face warmed by the reddening light and admired the arduous triumph of judgment over instinct, even as a certain admiration dawned through the monocle which insensibly focused his attention.

"And suppose," said Stingaree—"suppose you return empty as you came?"

"You will," said Stingaree as he leaned over, revolver in hand.

A contemptuous kick sent a pack of letters spinning.

"I should feel under no obligation to keep your secret."

"And you think I would trust you to keep it otherwise?"

"If I gave you my word," said Kentish, "I know you would."

Stingaree made no immediate answer, but he gazed in the sun flayed face without suspicion.

"You wouldn't give me your word," he said at last.

"Oh, yes, I would."

"That you would die without letting that name pass your lips?"

"Unless I die delirious—with all my heart. I have as much respect for it as you."

"As much!" echoed the bushranger in a strange blend of bitterness and obligation. "But how could you explain the bags. How could you have taken them from me?"

Kentish shrugged once more.

"You left them. I found them. Or you were sleeping, but I was unarmed."

"You would lie like that—to save my name?"

"And a man whom I remember perfectly"—

Stingaree heard no more; he was down on his knees, collecting the letters into heaps and shoveling them into the bags.

"You can't carry them," said he when none remained outside. "I'll take them for you and dump them on the track."

"I have to pass the time till midnight. I can manage them in two journeys."

But Stingaree insisted, and presently stood ready to mount his mare.

"You give me your word, Kentish?"

"My word of honor."

"It is something to have one to give! I shall not come back this way. We shall have the Clear Corner police on our tracks by moonlight, and the more they have to choose from the better. So I must go. You have given me your word. You wouldn't care to give me"—

But his hand went out a little as he spoke, and Kentish's met it seven-eighths of the way.

"Give this up, man! It's a poor game, when all's said. Do give it up!"

Question Followed Question, Compliment Capped Compliment.

urged the man of the world with the warmth of a lad. "Come back to England and"—

But the hand he had detained was wrenched from his, and in the pink sunset sifted through the pines, Stingaree vaulted into his saddle with an oath.

"With a price on my skin!" he cried, and galloped from the gully with a bitter laugh.

And in the moonlight sure enough came bobbing horsemen, with fluttering pugarees and short tunics with silver buttons, but they saw nothing of the missing passenger, who had carried the bags some distance down the road, and had found them quite a comfortable couch in a certain box clump commanding a sufficient view of the road. Nevertheless, when the little coach came swaying on its leathern springs, its scarlet enamel stained black as ink in the moonshine, he was on the spot to stop it with uplifted arms.

"Don't shoot!" he cried. "I'm the passenger you put down this afternoon." And the driver nearly tumbled from his perch.

"What about my mail bags?" he recovered himself enough to ask, for it was perfectly plain that the pretentiously intrepid passenger had been skulking all day in the scrub, scared by the terrors of the road.

"They're in that clump," replied Mr. Kentish. "And you can get them yourself or send some one else for them, for I've carried them far enough."

"That be blowed for a yarn!" cried the driver, forgetting his benefits in the virtuous indignation of the moment.

"I don't wonder at your thinking it one," returned the other mildly, "for I never had such absolute luck in all my life."

And he went on to amplify his first lie like a man.

Meanwhile a great crowd gathered about Kentish. He seemed like a man from another world. There were so many questions hurled at him that at first he refused point blank to answer any of them. There was a movement on the part of the crowd to carry him on their shoulders, which he quickly checked. He actually had to fight his way through the crowd. The crowd, finally noting his evident embarrassment, fell back.

But when the bags were really back in the coach, piled roof high on those of the downward mail, then it was worse fun for Guy Kentish outside than even he had anticipated. Question followed question, compliment capped compliment, and a certain unsteady undercurrent of incredulity by no means lessened his embarrassment. Had he but told the truth he felt he could have borne the praise, and indeed enjoyed it, for he had done far better than anybody was likely to suppose, and already it was irritating to have to keep that circumstance a secret. Yet one thing he was able to say from his soul before the coach drew up at the next stage.

"You should have a spell here," the driver had suggested, "and let me pick you up again on my way back. You'd soon lay hands on the bird himself, if you can put salt on his tail as you've done. And no one else can. We want a few more chums like you."

"I dare say!"

And the new chum's tone bore its own significance.

"You don't mean," cried the driver, "to go and tell me you'll hurry home after this?"

"Only by the first steamer!" said Guy Kentish.

And he kept that word as well.

POULTRY RAISING GETS IMPETUS; EXHIBITS TO RESTORE LOST PRESTIGE

Unless all signs fail to materialize, this city is to regain its lost prestige as a center for holding poultry shows; and it is unlikely that the sixteen or more men who are interesting themselves in the formation of the Fulton Poultry Association, together with the men who stick to the Oswego County Fair Association through thick and thin, to make of the latter organization something of great benefit to the people, will allow the present plans to drop out of sight.

Ameeting of the Poultry Association was held last night, in Mr. H. P. Allen's office, with sixteen members present. This number is a decided gain over the last meeting when eight men met for organization; and yet it is not to be wondered at that interest is aroused in making this city a poultry show center, as there are within a radius of three miles a large number of men interested in breeding fancy and prize-winning stock.

At a former meeting Mr. L. W. Richardson was elected secretary, but last night he resigned, because he felt he is loaded too heavily with duties in connection with the promotion of Fulton's interests, and Mr. James Ward, of the Ward Hotel, was elected in his place.

In times gone by Fulton was rated as a place where poultry shows in connection with the Agricultural fair were of a lot of consequence. Then it was not an uncommon occurrence to behold four and five carloads of birds arrive here for show purposes, and there is on record an instance when Canada sent seven carloads of birds to the fair. The Poultry Association and the Fair Association managers have set about the task of regaining the last ground, by making the next poultry show state-wide in its scope, rather than confining it to Oswego county, which has resulted disastrously to everybody interested in the Agricultural Fair and in propogating fancy poultry.

There are many fine collections of poultry in this vicinity, one of which is owned in Hannibal. At the last poultry show held in Madison Square Garden the owner of the Hannibal birds won four firsts, two seconds and seven ribbon. Mr. Martin Dietrich, superintendent of the water works, is a poultryman interesting himself in the prospects of redeeming Fulton as a center for the industry, and the Agricultural Society members have expressed themselves as willing to lend a hand in making the 1916 fair one of the biggest events in the history of poultry shows.

The Poultry Association has given up the idea of holding a show this season, but will work toward building up the feature during the Agricultural Fair, and added to that will be one of the largest winter shows in November or December, 1916, ever seen in this section of the state.

DEATH VISITS FAMILIES OF INSURANCE MEN

Two members of the office force of the Prudential Insurance company were in receipt yesterday of news which saddened both men.

The Messrs Joseph Chalifoux and Joseph Griffin are the members of the force who learned of deaths of near relatives— Mr. Chalifoux's mother having died in Mardin, while Mr. Griffin's loss is that of his father-in-law, Mr. Jeremiah Hanlon of Oswego.

"WITHIN THE LAW"

Play-goers will be glad to learn that the Quirk theater has secured for them "Within the Law" by Bayard Veiller, the play dealing with present day conditions in New York City, which has remained for a year at the Eltinge Theatre, and which has had the distinguished endorsement of the President, not to mention many other notables.

When Woodrow Wilson visited the metropolis recently, he sent for a box from which he witnessed Mr. Veiller's intense melodrama with tremendous interest. At the conclusion of the play he turned to the friends who accompanied him and observed, "I was never more thrilled and interested in all my life." This, in the language of another celebrated man, must be considered as approbation from Sir Hubert Stanley—"Praise indeed."

Prices in advertisement on page five.

An auction advertisement in The Evening Times for six days prior to the sale is the cheapest way to advertise a sale. adv.

G. M. WATSON HELD UP; EMPLOYE SUSPECTED

A. Dryden, N. Y., newspaper contains the following item concerning a former Fultonian who is the uncle of Mr. George E. and Mr. A. B. Mason, of Mason Brothers. The item follows:

G. M. Watson, proprietor of the cooper shop at the corner of Pendleton and Huntington streets in Cortland, while alone in the second story Saturday afternoon, was surprised by a masked robber armed with a revolver. The robber demanded money, and although Mr. Watson was carrying the payroll at the time he kept his head and told the fellow he had got the wrong man.

The intruder finally told Mr. Watson to have the money at five o'clock and backed out.

A Russian boy was arrested on suspicion and he has confessed the crime.

LODGE REPORTED TO BE IN FLOURISHING CONDIITION

Neahtawanta Lodge, No. 245, I. O. O. F., is, according to the reports made by its officers at last night's meeting in a most flourishing and prosperous condition. District Deputy Thompson of Phoenix, installed the officers who were present, and who were as follows: R. E. Crandall, N. G.; G. A. Rappole, V. G.; B. G. Boigeol, Sec.; F. H. Ure, Financial Sec.; G. B. Deuel, Treasurer.

Unavoidable absence of certain of the elected officers made necessary the postpontment of additional installation ceremonies, but the District Deputy has authorized Mr. W. H. Spanswick to perform the work at the next regular meeting.

The "get-together" meeting, held January 10th, is productive of good results, as the meeting last night was attended by many more than the usual number of members. Interest was shown in the work and plans were made for a mock trial, to be held in about two weeks, when the public will be welcomed to the temple.

IVES HAS FAITH IN HIS TEAM

Germans Meet His Men To-night---Syracuse Men's Record Embraces Victories Over First Raters.

Capt. Ives, of the Maccabee quintet is confident his team will score a victory over the Syracuse Turners' five tonight.

Whether or not Manager Snow has stretched his executive position a point by booking a team which in past years has played with the Buffalo Germans, Syracuse Pastimes, and others, remains to be seen.

Reg ardless of the outcome of the battle tonight, the spectators are assured of an exhibition of the court game which will be a treat in this city. No particular stars appear in the lineup of the Syracusans, the team beoing evenly balanced and depending entirely on the entire five to advance theb all.

The lineup of the local team will not be decided upon until the teams appear on the floor. Crockett, who was not in condition in the Normal game, has returned to form. He will occupy the center position, as usual, while O'Brien and Ives will undoubtedly play the forward positions.

LOCAL BOWLERS WIN THREE STRAIGHT GAMES

A picked team from this city and onefrom Oswego bowled a match last night on the Onyx alleys. The local quintet took three straight games.

P. Van Buren, Lott, Lindsley, McCollum and H. Van Buren formed the Fulton team, while Brown, Cary, Cobeau, Reed and Odell were the Oswego bowlers.

SOLVAY HIGH TO PLAY HERE

Harold Martin was yesterday selected as captain of the High school basketball team. Nelson Hopkins is manager.

High will oppose the Solvay High quintet on the City Hall court tomorrow night, in what promises to be an evenly matched game.

The lineup of the local team will be selected from the following players: Wallace, Martin, Reynolds, D. O'Brien, J. Johnson and Edward Frawley.

During a scrimmage which took place last night between the first and second teams two players collided and one of them, Reynolds, received a slight cut on the bridge of the nose. His injury is not of such a nature as to keep him from tomorrow's game.

The past week has seen a remarkable change in the form of the entire squad, more speed having been developed and better team work shown. The tendency to make long shots has been eliminated to a large extent. Coach Merrill has also been strict in enforcing proper training, with the result that all of the men are in tip top condition and the team should make a good showing in the remainder of the games scheduled.

Conservation.

"And," continued the lecturer, "I warrant you that there is not a man in this entire audience who has ever lifted his finger or in any way attempted to stop this awful waste of our forests and our lumber supply. If there is I want hat man to stand up."

There was a slight commotion in the rear of the room, and a nervous little man rose to the occasion—and his feet.

"And now, my friend, will you explain in just what way you have conserved the forests of our nation?"

And with the utmost gravity and sincerity the little man said, "I have used the same toothpick twice."—Harper's Magazine.

And Finis in the Middle.

Melting Ice.

Ice will melt if two pieces are rubbed together, the friction releasing some of the latent heat. Ice melts because heat forces its particles asunder, and when they are parted the ice becomes liquefied.

WROTE:

"When a Goose lays an egg, she just waddles off as if she is ashamed of it---because she is a goose.

"When a Hen lays an egg---ah, she calls heaven and earth to witness it!

"The Hen is the natural born advertiser. Hence the demand for hens' eggs exceeds the demand for goose eggs, and the hen has all the business she can attend to."

Make Better Men and Women, Mrs. E. T. Seton Asserts.

MUST LEARN NATURAL LAWS

"If You Catch Humanity Young Enough Chance of Letting in the Light is Greater," Declares Wife of Nature Writer—Lauds New Movement.

New York.—"One reason why I am so much interested in the outdoor movement that is sweeping over the country," said Mrs. Grace Gallatin Seton recently, "is because I believe that a nation can rise no higher than the level of its women and that it is best to begin early to make our women all that they should be to become the fitting wives and mothers of the race."

Mrs. Seton, wife of Ernest Thompson Seton and a member of the Council of the Woodcraft League, went on:

"It is also important to begin teaching the men while they are in the receptive period of boyhood the proper

MRS. ERNEST T. SETON.

attitude toward women. If boys and girls are brought up side by side with certain fundamental ideas of equality there will be no time when the man, having attained his majority, will have to reconstruct his ideas concerning the equal partnership of men and women in the various relationships of life, social, marital and civic.

"Nowadays a boy in many instances is permitted to feel when he comes into young manhood that his mother's opinions no longer have the same value they did when he was a growing boy. He thinks she doesn't understand the important things of life. Later, when his reason begins to operate, he has to fight the inheritance of a secret sense of man's superiority or remain hopelessly fixed in his view of humanity as a whole.

"One of the important things in the education of a boy is first of all to let him know the physical aspect of the country he lives in, the out of doors world about him and the natural laws that govern everything in it.

"And how important it is that the girls know outdoor life too! Therefore, that the training shall be fundamentally alike up to the point where it naturally separates, it is important that girls as well as boys shall have much of outdoor life in their younger years.

"A great deal of the value of outdoor life and work comes from the recovery of past knowledge of how to do things. It is a working out of the problem of development—a getting back to the source of creation in acquiring knowledge and efficiency in doing things.

"I see this outdoor movement as a vast picture. At the bottom is darkness, and ascending are layers of increasing light until the sun rays out its full glory above. Struggling, moving and growing all through these layers is humanity—souls in all stages of development. If you catch humanity young enough the chance of letting in the light is greater.

"If we are to develop in America distinctive schools of art, music and handicraft we must lay the foundations on those things which were distinctly American—woodcraft, outdoor life in general, the beautiful customs of the North American Indians and their art and picture writing. These we must first understand.

"Our woodcraft work is founded on the fundamental natural laws which were known to the North American Indians; hence many of their designs and symbols have been used in seeking to get back to the big constructive principles that govern human life. For instance, much symbolism is used. These symbols have their outer meaning for the passerby and their deeper spiritual significance for those who seek it.

"For our people to get the full benefit of the occasional respites from the workaday world that camping trips give they must know the wild by heart, and this can best be done by studying it when young; hence the importance of woodcraft work for boys and girls."

OPERATED ON 131 TIMES.

Patient in St. Louis Hospital Is Still Cheery at All Times.

St. Louis.—Harry Smyth, forty-two years old, of 3030 Laclede avenue is one of the most cheerful patients at the City hospital despite the fact that 131 surgical operations have been performed on him. Tuberculosis of the bones have made these operations necessary. Since childhood Smyth has passed most of his time in hospitals.

To occupy his time Smyth took up sewing and crocheting, and he is now an expert with the needle. He is always good natured.

NO DRY BATTERIES.

They All Contain Moisture or They Would Be Useless.

So called dry batteries are in common use for small electric call bell systems and private telephone lines and were used extensively for ignition on earlier makes of automobiles. Applying the word "dry" to the battery is misleading, for there is no such thing as a "dry" battery. There never was, nor will there ever be.

If it were dry no current would generate, as it requires moisture to produce chemico-electric activity when the circuit is completed from the plus to the minus elements.

The so called dry battery is really an "inclosed wet battery," which retains its moisture to its limit of life, whether in service or not. The limit of life depends on the stored capacity, how frequently the circuit is applied to it, evaporation due to age and deterioration of the conducting elements.

The battery consists of a zinc cylinder case containing a carbon in the center, the intervening space filled in with a paste compound of one part zinc oxide, one part sal ammoniac, three parts plaster of paris and two parts water. The quantities are greater as the capacity of the battery is increased.

As soon as a circuit is completed a chemical combination is started, and the current flows from the internal part of the zinc to the carbon, then out from the carbon to the appliance and returns to the zinc. The external terminals of the battery are the reverse of the internal.

When the battery is exhausted it can be recharged by sending current into it from a close circuit battery, such as a nitric or sulphuric acid cell. Pouring water through a small hole at the top of the battery is an aid to the return of its life, but neither this nor the former will restore the battery to its original efficiency. — New York World.

PLAYED THEM BOTH WAYS.

Magical Qualities of the Pyrenees Mineral Springs.

The French comedian Perlet was extraordinarily thin. A physician recommended him to try some bath in the Pyrenees, so he betook himself to the mineral springs, where he bathed unremittingly, but all in vain; he did not increase in size. "Patience," urged the doctor. "There is nothing like our baths for making people fat."

One day while Perlet was waiting philosophically in his bath for an embonpoint which never came he heard a conversation in the next room, from which his own was divided by only a thin partition and which was occupied by an enormous woman, fat as the Hottentot Venus.

"Doctor," said she, "I am getting tired of this." "Why?" asked the Aesculapius. "I have been here two months." "Well?" "Well, I am as enormous as I was when I came." "A little patience, madame," urged the doctor. "There is nothing like our baths for making people thin."

Perlet, hearing these words, sprang out of his bath, dressed, rushed home to his hotel, ordered his bill and left for Paris by the next train.—Argonaut.

Woman's Back Hair.

I recollect the Psyche knot.
Of devotees it had no lack.
It used to be employed a lot
A few years back.

But now, as through the town you hike,
You see a new twist on the job,
And some declare it looks just like
An old doorknob.
—Kansas City Journal.

Light Bread.

"Good morning," said an old lady briskly, entering a baker's shop. "Permit me to compliment you on the lightness of your bread."

The baker rubbed his hands and smiled benignly. "Thank you, madam," he said proudly, but respectfully. "It is my aim to bake the lightest bread in this city."

"And you do it," said the old lady. "If it gets much lighter it'll take two of your pound loaves to weigh sixteen ounces!"—London Mail.

A CITY FAIR.

Build ye a city, O men,
Build ye a city fair,
But forget ye not the soul must live,
And keep for us, here and there,
A plot of grass, a towering tree,
Where over our heads we skies may see
And silvery stars on high.

Build ye a city, O men,
Build ye a city fair;
Our bodies needs must live by bread,
But keep for us, here and there,
The good brown earth, the boundless sky,
Lest our souls a-hungered grow faint and die
Mid thy towering city fair.

Build ye a city, O men,
Build ye a city fair;
Build Gothic arch and marble hall,
But keep for us, here and there,
A plot of green, a waving tree,
Where in times of stress our souls may see
The light, for thy city fair.
—Anba.

CLUB HELPS VILLAGE.

Fifty Women Work Along Lines of Public Improvement.

The New Century club of Cobleskill, N. Y., was organized in 1896. It was federated with the New York State Federation of Women's Clubs in 1906 and with the General federation in 1915. The club has an active membership of fifty women, who are working along progressive lines. Matters of village improvement receive much attention, and the committees of public health and civics have recently been added to the other standing committees.

The work of the club has broadened until along with its literary study the organization is actively engaged in philanthropic and civic work. Last year the club gave $75 to the school library, and previously it had given a great many trees to beautify the village parks, besides lending a hand whenever needed for the social and moral uplift of the community.

Lighting the Drinking Fountain.

A particularly attractive public drinking fountain which occupies a conspicuous location at the head of a square in Lynn, Mass., is shown in the accompanying illustration. The structure is of concrete in simple and artistic design. On top of the canopy are four incandescent electric lighting units, each inclosed in a glass globe about eight inches in diameter.—American City.

Campaign of Southern Cities.

Representatives in commercial clubs of important cities in the south met recently at Nashville, Tenn., to devise ways and means of exploiting and advertising the section.

Realizing the south's tremendous business possibilities, many cities sent delegates.

Business men of the sixteen states south of the Ohio river declare capital has failed to recognize latent commercial possibilities in this territory. They contend that the fault is not so much with the capitalist and investor as in the lack of incentive offered big business to locate in the south and in a failure to exploit resources and natural advantages.

To acquaint the rest of the world with existing conditions a systematic publicity campaign is planned to bring about improved business conditions in the south.

When fully developed and in operation upon the basis proposed this campaign, it is promised, will be the most effective in the history of commercial advertising.

Cities have successfully advertised themselves, but never has any entire section attempted such an undertaking. Experts in publicity say this aspect of the campaign will of itself attract worldwide attention.

Advertising the Quaker City.

A movement to advertise Philadelphia as a manufacturing city before every trade body in the country was inaugurated recently at a meeting of the chamber of commerce. Through a committee of 100 business men, known as the Philadelphia traveling commission, the commercial activities of the city, its markets and products will be made known to every town from coast to coast.

Miss Rosamond Pinchot, Expert Rider and Driver.

Noted for her skill in the saddle and in driving high mettled horses is Miss Rosamond Pinchot, daughter of Amos R. E. Pinchot of New York city, famous for his sociological work. Ever since she was big enough to sit on a pony's back Rosamond has been instructed in the art of handling horses until she is as capable of saddling her mount or harnessing her driver as well as any groom—not that she usually performs such tasks, but she can do so if occasion requires. In the saddle Rosamond is perfectly at home, and at the recent horse show she drove her ponies in competition in the ring.

"Ships of Fate."

As nuts are plentiful at this time of the year, the following game can easily be played:

Prepare as many half shells of walnuts as there are guests. In each fasten a small candle with a drop of wax.

Fill a tub with water, and before sailing the boats the water should be agitated, so as to have it wavy. Two at a time may sail their boats, lighting their candles as they do so. The life of the owner is prophesied by the seaworthy qualities of his ship.

If the storm overcomes the ship the owner will be wrecked by adversity. The ship sailing across the tub signifies a long sea voyage, while those remaining by the side show that the person loves home better.

If the two ships stay together throughout the trip the couple owning them will have a happy marriage. If they bump together that signifies a quarrel, and if they sail in opposite directions each person will lead a single life.

Boy Scouts of Hawaii.

Under the heading "Scouting In Hawaii" Scouting prints the following:

A. A. Wilder, special field scout commissioner for Hawaii, reports that scouting is booming in these island possessions of the United States. Plans are being made for raising a budget to carry on the work in a more systematic manner and to extend the benefits of the movement to a greater number of boys. A contribution of $1,000 has been received as a starter for this fund.

Plans are also being made for the sixth annual rally to be held on Washington's birthday. It has been suggested that scouts from all the islands in the group be invited to attend and that this be made the first of a series of interisland gatherings.

Hole In the Ice.

A game that is great fun to play is called "hole in the ice." The hole, or crack, in the ice is represented by two chalk lines on the floor. One row of children at a time runs or jumps in turn, trying to jump over the hole. If any one touches the floor between the lines instead of going home to his seat he must first come to the front of the room, while the others are jumping, and dry his feet by running on tiptoe "on the ice." The width of the crack may be gradually increased so as to make this game more difficult.

The Two Misses.

Little Miss Hurry,
All bustle and flurry,
Comes down to her breakfast ten minutes too late;
Her hair is a-rumple,
Her gown is a-crumple,
She's no time to button and hook herself straight.
She hunts and she rushes
For needles and brushes,
For books and for pencils flies upstairs and down.
If ever you find her
Just follow behind her
A trail of shoe buttons and shreds of her gown.

But little Miss Steady
By school time is ready,
All smiling and shining and neat in her place;
With no need to worry,
She pities Miss Hurry,
Who but yesterday sat here with shame in her face.
Her heart beating lightly
With duty done rightly,
She vowed she will never again change her name,
For though you'd not guess it,
I'm bound to confess it,
These two little maidens are one and the same.

—St. Paul Pioneer-Press.

HOUSEHOLD LINENS.

Some Interesting Suggestions About the Proper Place to Mark Napkins.

No housekeeper can ever have enough attractive linen for her table and her bedrooms. She may have enough for actual service, but it is wise to keep just a little ahead of the actual need in extra towels for guest room and bathroom. It is also advisable to keep just a little ahead in the supply of linen for the table.

Every set of napkins and each tablecloth should have the housewife's surname initial or her monogram embroidered upon it. There is a question as to the proper place to put the initial or monogram, but the majority prefer the letter on tablecloths to be in the corner, where they will come just off the rounded edge of the table.

Napkins should have the initials in the corner or in the middle on one side, where they will be on top when the napkins are folded. Tea napkins are the only ones on which a wreath can appropriately be placed. It is quite permissible to place an initial within the wreath or other decorative motif. Tea napkins can also be finished with hemstitched or scalloped edges.

Some women may argue that they haven't time to put fancy work on household linen. This is a poor argument, for almost every woman has a few moments during the day when she sits down to chat with a neighbor or when she is waiting for the homecoming of her husband to his evening meal. It is during these odd moments that a great deal can be accomplished, especially in the way of fancy work. Pick up work is good for the nerves.

SHUTTING OUT SUNSHINE.

Various Ways to Brighten Up a Home In Winter.

If the housewife wishes to keep cheerful and happy she must provide for herself surroundings calculated to cheer and uplift. This can never be done by shutting out the sunshine and darkening the rooms with heavy hangings and somber papers. Rather it is her part to furnish her home with sunny papers and bright draperies.

This need not mean that the home must look out of date or cheap. The interior decorators have used chintzes so lavishly in their work of late years that it is considered very smart. They have produced some startling effects with the futurist cretonnes and the elaborate black and white chintzes. Nor can this material by any means be considered cheap when the good cretonnes sell up to $4 and $5 a yard. It is fortunate, however, for women of moderate means that chintz also sells as low as 12 and 15 cents a yard.

With the aid of plain, light colored wall paper and expensive or inexpensive chintz a home can be made to look 10 degrees lighter than it did when filled with dark velvets and subdued wall papers. The effect this change will have on the dispositions of the inmates of the home will quite offset any extra expense incurred in bringing it about. Bright surroundings are essential to bright natures.

Deviled Scallops.

Cream one-third cupful of butter, gradually beat in two teaspoonfuls of mustard, three-quarter teaspoonful of salt and one-quarter teaspoonful of cayenne; then add one quart of parboiled scallops finely chopped and one cupful of hot milk. Mix thoroughly, turn into a buttered baking dish, cover with one cupful of hot milk. Mix thoroughly, turn into a buttered baking dish, cover with one cupful of fine crumbs, dot with bits of butter and bake about twenty minutes.

Velveteen Coat Trimmed With Beaver

Designed by Lane Bryant, New York.

THIS coat is elegantly made of finest quality black or navy velveteen. The wide shawl collar and long revers are trimmed with bandings of beaver fur. The sleeve has deep turnback cuffs. Large buttons of self material trim the cuffs and belt. The collar may be worn [illegible] high close to the neck. The coat is lined with peau de cygne and warmly interlined. This coat can be carried out somewhat more simply in cloth, still retaining the fur trimming.

Drapery or a loose panel falling from the waist line gives a pleasing effect to a figure that is very full in the back. The short waisted woman must avoid cutup effects. Long, unbroken lines are her salvation. Neither should she adopt a contrasting waist and skirt. She should wear dresses instead of shirt waists or else have them both match in color. Keep the shoulder line narrow, and in selecting a suit, whether you are tall or short, have the coat come well over the hips. Have it arranged like this: One third coat and two-thirds skirt or two-thirds coat and one-third skirt.

The overslender woman can wear all kinds of fluffy things under her gowns to build up the figure. She may choose rough goods, large figures, checks, taffeta silks and crisp materials. The thin woman must not wear skimpy, clinging clothes, narrow stripes running up and down nor deep yokes that give a dragged look over the bust. She may wear, if tall, a large hat.

• • •

A red haired woman cannot expect to be ravishing in pink or reddish purple, as either tends to heighten the color of her hair. Navy blue may be used sparingly, but brown is the color for the auburn haired woman. Some shades of sage green are becoming and gray (if the complexion is clear), black and white.

A brunette with good coloring can wear any color, but if sallow let her forego purple, green and red. Blue eyes and a poor complexion are improved by dull Alice blue. This is the best color to freshen the complexion of one who is no longer young.

Black and white ornaments continue in high favor, and some very beautiful specimens of this kind of jewelry are shown. Notable is the checkerboard pattern, achieved by mounting squares of cut jet in alternation with squares of closely set diamonds or rhinestones in a delicate silver setting. Silver, by the bye, is the craze in high class jewelry now—silver and the more expensive platinum—and the pure white lights of diamonds set in silver are considered more distinguished than the yellow glint produced by gold.

Interesting Frock of Foulard.

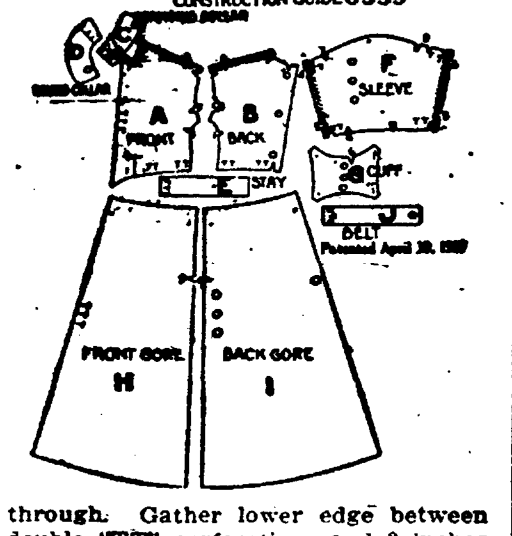
Equally appropriate for afternoon or informal evening wear is this frock of foulard trimmed with black satin.

The new taffetas and foulards promise to be very beautiful. Especially will they be suited to the development of frocks of the one-piece genre. The model shown here is in a pleasing shade of green foulard trimmed with black satin and black silk soutache braid. The waist is made with drop shoulders, while the neck is finished with a high collar. The three-piece skirt is attached to the waist under a satin girdle. Deep cuffs of the foulard are bound with satin and trimmed with buttons.

In medium size the costume requires 5 yards 36-inch foulard with 1 yard 3-inch satin for the trimming.

After closing the under-arm and shoulder seams of the waist, as the first step in making the dress, hem the back. Bear in mind that the large "O" perforations indicate the center back. Next, pleat the extensions at the front, as perforated, and bring folded edge to corresponding small "o" perforations: tack to position at upper edge of pleat, leaving lower part free to pass belt through. Gather lower edge between double "TT" perforations and 2 inches above. Adjust stay to position underneath gathers, center-fronts even, small "o" perforation at under-arm seam and bring back edge to center-back. Sew standing collar to neck edge as notched: large "O" perforation in collar indicates center-back.



Close the sleeve seam as notched, and gather upper and lower edges between double "TT" perforations. Turn under edge of cuff on slot perforations, lap to small "o" perforations and stitch, leaving edges free below double "oo" perforation. Line cuff, sew to long sleeve as notched, single small "o" perforation in cuff at seam of sleeve and bring the pointed end of cuff to large "O" perforation in sleeve.

Join the skirt gores as notched. Close back seam from large "O" perforation to lower edge, finish edges above for a placket. Gather entire upper edge. Adjust skirt to position, stitching upper edge along upper row of gathers in waist, center-fronts and center-backs even, side seam of skirt at under-arm. Adjust the belt to position, slipping underneath extension in front, center-fronts and center-backs even and tack extension on belt.

Finish the skirt with bias folds stitched along the upper edge only.

CREED FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

Edward T. Stitt, district superintendent of the New York city schools, has issued a "city creed for social service," which reads:

We believe—

That social betterment of the masses can be best accomplished by a wider use of our school plants.

That the conservation of our youths is as important as that of our national resources.

That low taxes are to be favored if they do not lead to a low standard of living.

That all people who work shall have an opportunity to play.

That strength of body allied to strength of mind will develop good all around Americans.

That the personality of our teaching force and a conservation of their energies are necessary in social regeneration.

That large cities should be as proud of sturdy children and strong workmen as of beautiful parks or public buildings.

That the best monuments of which a city can boast are the upright lives of its happy and contented citizens.

That the many millions spent for warfare would be better spent for welfare.

That as the Declaration of Independence not only guarantees life and liberty, but also the pursuit of happiness, it is the sacred duty of every city to provide rest and recreation for its weary wage earners.

January Relishes.

AN APPETIZER WORTH WHILE.—A cold cooked beet or a hard boiled egg when minced very fine and added to a French salad dressing will give quite a "company look" to an otherwise plain salad, while a bit of cottage cheese and a minced olive or two, together with a "left over" sardine, the whole moistened with mayonnaise and spread on round biscuits or bits of toasted bread, make an appetizer worthy of 1916.

Sardines In Aspic.—A small bread pan is a good mold for this dish. Set in a pan of cracked ice and water, pour in liquid aspic to form a thin layer and upon this lay a row of sardines, each in a bed of finely chopped parsley. Fix each in place with a few drops of liquid jelly, then cover with jelly, and when this is firm arrange upon it another row of sardines and cover with jelly as before.

Tomato Jelly.—Three-quarters box of gelatin (scant), three-quarters cupful cold water, a can tomatoes, one-half onion, stalk celery, two tablespoonfuls tarragon vinegar, two cloves, a bay leaf, few grains cayenne. Soften the gelatin five minutes in cold water. Cook together the other ingredients, except the vinegar, ten minutes, add the vinegar and softened gelatin and stir until dissolved, then strain. Pour into a mold and set in a cool place or on ice to form. When cold turn from the mold, garnish with crisp lettuce leaves and pour mayonnaise dressing over the whole.

Cheese Rolls.—A most delicious surprise in the place of sandwiches to serve with coffee or chocolate is made with the aid of whipped cream and cheese. Make some light, tender, raised rolls, shaped long and narrow. When they are cold cut off the tops of the rolls and remove some of the center. Just before serving take a small jar of cheese and cream it with a quarter as much butter and fold into a half cupful of cream whipped stiff. Fill the rolls and replace the covers.

Cheese Fondue.—Needed, one-quarter pound of grated cheese, two eggs, quarter pint white sauce, pepper, salt and mustard.

To make prepare the sauce, add the cheese and yolks of the eggs, also the seasonings. Beat the whites stiffly and stir gently into the mixture. Place in a well buttered pie dish and bake for fifteen minutes.

The Change of a Word.

"You wouldn't think there'd be enough difference between the definite and the indefinite article to matter much, would you?" said a woman who writes for a living. "I made a lifelong enemy of a woman once just by writing 'the' where I meant 'a.' It was an account of her wedding I was doing. I said something about the ceremony being performed at the home of the bride's aunt, and then I added that there were present 'only the few friends of the family.' The bride never got over that 'the' in front of few. It happened five years ago, and when my name is mentioned she still froths at the mouth."—Washington Post.

GIVING UP ADVERTISING!

GOING OUT OF BUSINESS!

The last sentence is a logical deduction of the first one; but in this case, GIVING UP ADVERTISING means CREATING BUSINESS FOR FULTON MERCHANTS AND FULTON PEOPLE. With The Evening Times, Giving up advertising means refusal to accept the voluntary business of merchants located in Oswego and Syracuse. It's a case of handing back real money to the man who wants trade from Fulton.

The Times is Handing Back Real Money Every Day to Out-of-Town Merchants

Because the agreement was made in good faith and with eyes open to the seriousness of the situation. To refuse out-of-town advertising is to do something for our town—your town. We are doing more than our share of boosting for your neighbor who may be one of Fulton's merchants—and we are glad to do that much.

WE THANK THE MERCHANTS FOR THEIR APPRECIATION OF THE BIG STEP,

And we wish them the success they so richly deserve. Here is something for you, Mr. Householder, to do—KEEP YOUR EYES UPON THE MERCHANTS WHO ARE DOING THE MOST FOR THE CITY OF FULTON.

CITIZENS CLUB READY TO CELEBRATE GREATLY IMPROVED QUARTERS

The stately old Gardner mansion in East 1st st., for the last few years the home of the Citizens Club, has undergone a veritable interior transformation at the hands of carpenters, painters and decorators. As a result of an expenditure of a lot of money, thought and labor the club rooms now rank with the leaders in their class, to be found anywhere, and, what is most encouraging of all to the membership, there has been a large number of names added to the roster, making in all 200 resident and 25 non-resident members. There is one feature of the improvements, that of illumination, which adds more to the comfort and beauty of the clubhouse than perhaps any of the others. In former days the different rooms were lighted mainly by incandescent gas lights, but now an indirect lighting system casts over the homey rooms the right density of warm, soft light as to make one want to tarry long—and rest.

Were members removed to return to the rejuvenated clubhouse they would find instead of the southern half of the lower floor, made up of three small rooms, one large room, where may be seated as many as 100 men who might be drawn to form an audience around a speaker or lecturer. This one big room has a new hardwood floor, rug-covered, and may be transformed into a ballroom in the twinkling of an eye.

Pedestrians in East 1st st. have seldom failed to note in days gone by the flowering plants in a small conservatory at the southern side of the old building. Here, too, a change has been made. The flowers and plants are removed and the space left forms a pleasing resting spot, warm and bright—just the place for indulging in a confidential, whispered talk.

Ever since the inauguration of noonday luncheons as a feature of downtown club life, congestion has at times resulted in the Citizens dining room, but now, with the large southern room available ample accommodations may be provided for diners, or even banqueters. Noonday luncheons at the Citizens have grown in popularity within a short space of time, as not many months ago it was hard to secure the attendance of more than one-half dozen men, whereas, these days at least fifteen "regulars" are to be found seated around the tables partaking of food prepared in a homelike, appetizing way.

The board of directors of the club do not propose to allow an event in history to pass unnoticed. They have, therefore, decided upon celebrating the completion of the improvements by holding a musical and literary entertainment during the present month. At that time the spacious clubrooms will be thrown open to the members and their friends, and the Citizen Club of Fulton will have come into its own—a clean, safe resting place for the man of the business and professional world.

PUBLIC MARKET PLACE STAMPED WITH APPROVAL

tations to the southern line of their factory. The trackage adjoining the Gage factory will not be interfered with."

In outlining the plan for the market, it was stated that a large convention hall, or auditorium would be built over the market, there would be rest rooms for the farmers and other conveniences. The State Food and Market Commission has already promised that all the surplus goods which the farmers were unable to sell in this city would be purchased at regular prices. Mr. Whitaker terminated his address by stating that he had been in conversation with a number of Grange members of Oswego country, who had voiced their ill feelings towards the city due to the discrimination which they believed had been made in the case of the farmers.

Mayor Lewis asked about the financing of the market and Mr. Whitaker stated that the Chamber of Commerce would finance the purchase of the land, also the construction of the market. He stated that the City Charter left the city market in he control of the council. At any time in the future when the ciy was able financially to take over the market this could be done, meanwhile an operating committee could be selected by the council.

The ordinance fixing the license fee on taxicabs and other vehicles was rescinded by an act of the council and another ordinance framed which fixes the fee at $50 for the first automobile and $2 for each car additional. Every other passenger carrying vehicle is taxed $2 yearly.

Assessment against George Johnston for taxes on personal property was cancelled, having been declared erroneous. Alderman Distin, chairman of the Finance Committee, stated that such bills as there was cash to cover had been audited. Alderman Quirk stated that the Pension Committee was not prepared to report.

Agatha Wuychuch, midwife, will not receive the fee of $3 in payment for reporting births to the office of the city clerk. It was stated that the women had performed her duties without the necessary license. The Academy of Medicine at its last meeting had taken up the case and investigated it.

Following complaint of a number of women passengers of the Empire United Railways local service, the Council introduced a resolution requesting the City Attorney to interview the trolley people about discharging passengers from the front of the car in such places as will permit desirable footing. Many people have stated that they were not allowed to alight from the rear of the car and that in getting off of the front end they have been obliged to step into snowdrifts.

A resolution accepting the report of City Chamberlain Adkins on the city finances was introduced. Mr. Adkins addressed the board and summarized his report. He told of the inefficiency he had discovered in going over the various records on assessments, that to his knowledge there are people in the city whose taxes have not been increased or decreased in years, there are others who are not assessed at all, and many erroneous assessments appear. Suggestions were made by the chamberlain as to improvements in the conduct of city affairs.

1200 BUSHELS ONIONS BURNED IN EARLY MORNING FIRE AT BOWENS CORNERS

Twelve hundred bushels of onions, grown on muck land, by Mr. Erema Fuller, of Bowen's Corners, were destroyed by fire which originated in an unknown manner in the new cold storage plant recently built on the farm by Mr. Fuller. In addition to the onions, which represented in part a season's hard work, there were destroyed a brand new buggy, a cutter and a number of farming implements.

The fire occurred at an early hour, 5 o'clock, before the arrival of a member of the family at the cold storage plant, and no one knows what caused it. One unfortunate feature of the loss is that Mr. Fuller has been holding his crop of onions for a higher price—$1.50 a bushel, having refused the sum of $1.25, with excellent prospects of securing the advance.

The loss is estimated in the neighborhood of $3500, which was covered only partly by insurance, the risk being upon the storage plant, and not upon the contents of the building, which included in addition to the items mentioned a large number of lettuce crates.

Our Washington Letter

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE

"I think the people of my district and in fact the people of my state are rapidly getting cold feet on the president's proposed policy of preparedness," said an Oklahoma congressman, to a group of his colleagues on the floor of the House. "To all appearances there has been a big shift in sentiment and the people out in our state are not looking with great favor or enthusism on the proposition to spend vast sums of money to prepare for war. They are already complaining of the tax burdens imposed on them and others likely to come. We Democrats are in a ticklish position, for Oklahoma in 1916 is a debatable state."

While a freight car was being shifted to the trestle in the yard of the T. H. Marvin Coal company at noon today, the car containing fifty tons of coal jumped the track and stopped in a right angle position to the tracks.

The incident occurred on the "Y" at Broadway. An O. & W. shifting engine was pushing the car at the time. A crew was engaged all afternoon in placing the car in position.

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

Men who know how, want to and WILL do things.

* * *

Are you doing what you can to help the town?
Are you passing out a smile instead of frown?
When there's anything to do
It will make you better too
And spread renown.

Do you buy your goods at home when e'er you can?
And support and aid your friend and fellowman?
A dollar spent right here
May come back within a year,
Bringing gladness and good cheer
And help your clan.

Have you welcomed strangers just the way you should?
Treating them the very finest that you could?
You may call on them some day,
With perhaps a debt to pay,
And secure a slight delay
If you would.

Will you invest your surplus cash right here?
Where you can watch it work and never fear?
It will help in taxes too,
And a lot come back to you,
Give employment to a few,
And be near.

Is there anything which pays like work for all?
Whether it be country, home or city's call?
We can serve ourselves the best
Just by working for the rest,
And perhaps we may be blessed
Through it all.

In this city, as in all places, there are certain men who profit by the work of others, and who do nothing personally to promote the general welfare upon which their success very much depends; they have not learned the great truth in life that "He profits most who serves best." This splendid sentiment means to help the other fellow and to do it when he needs help the most. It is true that this city will continue to prosper if these men do not take an active part, but if they are figuring that they will share in the good things without contributing one cent of money or one hour of personal effort they are reckoning against fate.

This city is noted for the broad gauged spirit of competition which exists amongst its business men (?). No man can stand on the outside and shine by reflected light, it is better to take off your coat, wade right in and not be afraid but that the others who will see you working will grant the reward which comes for service for your fellow man.

A nice way to start on a program of good resolutions is to induce your friend to become a member of the Chamber of Commerce.

The meeting of the members will be held in the Library this evening at eight o'clock and we hope that a good crowd will be present to listen to some of the most important statements in regard to the life of the city and for the welfare of the people.

* * *

Be there prompt at 8 o'clock and you will go home satisfied.

Remember that one hour spent for the good of your city means sometimes very large returns.

Are you aware of the fact that you ought to be there tonight?

TO THE TAXPAYERS OF FULTON

In reply to the many questions as to who is at fault for the present deficiency of the City of Fulton, will say that it is impossible to place the blame on any one administration, inasmuch as all former administrations have lacked the necessary qualification for running a city as it should be run, and each has inherited the deficit of the former administration.

I take pleasure in stating that in the short time Mr. George Washburn acted as Chamberlain, his work has been very accurate and all moneys received in his department, as well as expenditures, have been accounted for.

H. W. ADKINIS
City Chamberlain.

Unlicensed Vendors Annoy Retail Milk Dealers; Want Redress

Taxicab proprietors are not the only class of citizens seeking the protection of the city. Since the action taken by the Common Council in connection with advancing the license fee exacted from taxi owners, comes along a suggestion of the milk dealers who would have the present peddlers' license fee advanced from $1 to a sum adequate for the protection of legitimate retailers.

In deciding on the $50 fee for taxicabs, the argument was made that the rate woudld serve as greater a protection than the present fee to the taxicab owners who operate day and night all the year around. A number of automobile owners, appear during the summer months and "pick the cream of the trade" while the sun shines.

This class remains indifferent toward the public needs this winter winds do bluw.

The same argument holds good in the case of milk peddlers, says one of the largest distributors of milk in this city. This man claims that for the protection of all-year-round dealers, a proper fee should be fixed by the city. "During the winter months," the dealer continued, "there are a number of pirate milk dealers, who resort to price-cutting and serving inferior milk, proving of considerable disadvantage to regular distributors. These mben, who operate mostly during the winter months—and only during this time because of the small expense incurred in distribution, are a public nuisance affecting the trade as well as the dealers, and some definite action by the city officials should be taken to remedy conditions.

POULTRY ASSOCIATION AIMS TO GIVE EVERY HEN A CHANCE TO WIN A PRIZE

The news of the doings of the Fulton Poultry Association, published in the Evening Times yesterday, has aroused a lot of interest in the project of combining one grand big poultry show with the Oswego County Agricultural Society's fair next autumn.

Comment on the matter indicates that this city will experience a worth while hen show where people may obtain some accurate information and thinking powers about farming. It is not proposed to hold the usual form of poultry show, where almost every body wins a prize for the good looks of his hens, judged by certain standards laid down by the ordinary judge. It is the purpose of the Poultry Association and the management of the fair to judge the poultry shown here on results, which are to be as accurade as addition and subtraction.

It too often happens that judges of poultry fail to adopt the right method of awarding prizes, therefore the local enthusiasts want to see the old method adopted of counting the eggs which the hen lays to learn the value of a hen. They say that that is what a hen is for—to lay eggs, and when a hen lays a lot of eggs at all seasons of the year, she deserves a whole lot of credit. In other words, it is the intent of the Fulton Poultry Association to give the homely old hen a chance to become popular, and not to relegate her to the side lines just because she may not have pink eyes. It is a well known fact that the homely hen has her place when poultry shows are going on, but usually it is to stay at home and supply the family and the neighborhood with nice fresh eggs. But the Fulton Association is going to see that she gets her rights.

NOBLE GRAND RECEIVES GAVEL FROM PHOENIX

No more delichted member of Neahtawanta Lodge, No. 245, I. O. O. F., existed in this city Wednesday evening, than the newly-installed Noble Grand, R. L. Crandall, whose services in behalf of the lodge wherein his Odd Fellowship originated, were recognized by his former associates. Mr. Crandall had a reason for becoming excited, but it is not related that he lost his head at the time a representative of Golden Rule Lodge, of Phoenix, in a neat presentation speech, handed the new presiding officer of Neahtawanta a handsome rosewood gavel. Mr. Crandall accepted the token by making a few happy remarks, receiving the congratulations of his fellow members.

State's Soil Lacking in Vegetable Matter, Says Forest Henry

Dr. M. Hamilton, of Delhi, this morning at 10 a. m. opened the program of the Farmers' Institute in the local Grange Hall, after prayer had been offered by the Rev. Charles Olmstead. The attendance at the first session numbered sixty people.

Dr. Hamilton presented an outline of the purpose of the Institute, also explaining roughly the order of the program for the two days' session.

A talk on fertility by Forest Henry, of Dover, Minn., and a talk on the diseases of domestic animals, as well as the care of horses, by Dr. Hamilton took up the entire morning session.

Mr. Henry's topic was sub-divided into three parts, viz: drainage, humus, and tillage. In speaking of drainage, he stated farmers should never fear that by drainage they could get the land too dry, because all water which will run off should be taken away. About eighty per cent of the State would be benefited by drainage. This is particularly noticeable where there is a lack of humus in the soil.

In defining humus, the speaker stated the great need of the soils of New York is more vegetable matter. A soil well supplied with vegetable matter is always a fertile soil. Vegetable matter rotting in the soil increases available plant food in the soil. It also equalizes moisture in the soil, which is very important in either the dry or wet years.

As land grows older it requires better tillage. Tillage also increases plant food. We need tillage also to conserve soil moisture. Many of our seasons are entirely too wet in the early Spring but become very dry in the latter part of the year.

"Give a horse plenty of salt," Dr. Hamilton advised, "also water it frequently, but do not give it too much water at a time. Don't feed a tired horse with a large quantity of meal nor make sudden changes in the food." Dr. Hamilton also dwelt at length upon the various diseases of horses, preventives of diseases, etc.

The afternoon session convened in the hall at 1:00 o'clock with

POTATOES BRINGING HIGH PRICES; MAY GO HIGHER; MANY HELD IN STORAGE

The price of potatoes has taken a steady jump in this city and other towns roundabout since the harvest last fall, and indications point to still higher prices, although in this respect, there are indications that some growers may be disappointed. It is well known that the crop of potatoes last fall was far short of the normal yield, and this is particularly true in the town of Granby, where potatoes grow to a high state of perfection and excellence, while the bulk of the yield was considered of poor keeping quality. This is due to the heavy rainfall at critical times in the life of the growing potato.

Dealers in this city have experienced no difficulty in getting all the potatoes they need, and this in spite of the fact that many farmers are holding back for fancy prices. Farmers are now getting 85 and 90 cents a bushel, and in some instances as high as $1 a bushel. Consumers of this necessary article of diet are paying 30, 35, and 40 cents a peck, according to the store in which they are sold. A bushel of potatoes will bring today $1.50 and $1.60.

News comes from Pulaski of 10,000 bushels of potatoes being held in storage there waiting higher prices. Reports coming from other places in Central New York indicate there are enough potatoes being held to carry the trade until early potatoes reach this section from the south. It may be that many farmers will hold on too long as they did a few years ago when the bottom dropped out suddenly.

One year ago potatoes were retailing for 50, 55 and 60 cents a bushel.

HOW TO CONTROL GINSENG ILLS

The disease known as mildew, Japanese mildew, or soft rot, which attacks ginseng plants, is found in every one of the fifteen states in which ginseng is grown, according to a bulletin just published by the plant pathologists of the New York State College of Agriculture.

Nearly a century ago, they state, about 360,000 pounds of ginseng were exported from this country in a year, mainly to China. A recent investigation shows that these figures have been decreased by over 100,000 pounds. This falling off, it is said, may be attributed in part to the ravages of Phytophthora, or mildew disease of ginseng.

The college authorities suggest six methods for controlling and preventing the disease. One method, they state, is to spray the plants with a fungicide early in the spring, just as they are pushing out of the soil. They suggest bordeaux mixture, 3-3-50, to which has been added 2 pounds of arsenate of lead for every 50 gallons of the mixture. The spraying, should be continued until all the plants have appeared, and special care should be taken to thoroughly reach all parts of the new growth with the mixture.

Other supplemental methods that are offered for controlling the disease include the removal of diseased plants or parts of plants, deep planting, rotation, sterilization of soil, and drainage to remove any accumulation of moisture, since excessive moisture favors vegetable rots.

A copy of the new bulletin, Phytophthora disease of ginseng may be obtained by any resident of New York, without charge, on application to the New York State College of Agriculture at Ithaca, New York.

SHEPARD HAS BILL TO AID FARMER TO BORROW

Washington—Senator Sheppard, of Texas, has introduced a bill intended to enable the farmer to obtain financial assistance on the securities the agriculturist can most easily mobolize. The bill provides for the establishment of a national rural credit institute, and the creating of local "landschafts."

The positions of Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury and of Agriculture "For Rural Credit" are created. These officials, with the secretaries of the two departments are to make up the institute.

The "Landschafts" are to be made up of farm owners within a designated area who desire long-term loans on the security of their farms. All members must be applicants for loans, and membership ceases upon repayment of the loan.

The "Landschafts" are authorized to issue debentures, etc. Rates of interest and all other details are to be arranged by the local organizations subject to approval by the National Rural Credit Institute. The scheme is patterened after some now in operation in foreign countries.

HATS OFF TO MR. ADKINS

Much is to be learned from the news of the decision reached by the geologists who have examined the conditions at Panama. The scientific men have come to the conclusion that the only way to conquer the canal slides is to keep on digging until all the earth that is inclined to move has been gotten out of the way.

That is the way to accomplish almost anything—keep on digging away the obstacles, no matter when or where they are found. Everything depends at all times upon the disposition and the ability to keep on digging, per se, the work performed in the interests of the taxpayers of this city by plucky Mr. Herbert W. Adkins, City Chamberlain for the short period of less than one month.

In making a report of his findings secured by auditing the accounts as handed down to him by his many predecessors, this young man has not indulged in the usual slopping over on the state of affairs in his office. His statement of facts and figures contains no laudation of the work of former officials, of the persons employed from time to time to present an audit of the city's accounts; neither does he indulge in rasping denunication of the practices that have been the result of ignorance rather than —in some instances—criminal intent. Mr. Adkins has worked night and day to secure his figures. He is no doubt viewed with disfavor by that class of patriots who would destroy every piece of evidence leading to their incrimination. He has expressed himself as willing to sacrifice his position, in the belief that nothing is profitable which is dishonest. He appears as one willing to try treading the unbeaten road, even though it does not look to be the safest. Mr. Adkins has blazed the way for the people of Fulton. His report is illuminating, so much so that if there is an office of red blood in the veins of the men who want a clean city, now is the time to show it. The aldermen of this city are acquainted with conditions. They are not facing a theory. They have facts, and it is high time they are given to understand that all of us are a part of the city government. Our welfare is its concern and its success is our concern. In other words, it is up to the aldermen of Fulton to crawl from beneath the stand-pat blanket. If they prefer to remain where they are now hiding, then it is up to the people who want good things for this city to make them feel that they have a right to become a part of the city government.

SECRETARY DANIELS SHOULD RESIGN

During his administration of the Navy Department Secretary Daniels has done nothing that demonstrates his incompetence and irresponsibility more completely than his remarkable performance in suppressing the annual report which Admiral Frank F. Fletcher, made on August 15, 1915. The report has been shrouded in secrecy. Until Senator Lodge called for it in a resolution it was kept under lock and key, and when transmitted to the Naval Affairs Committee the majority of the committee decided to treat it as confidential.

In his annual report the commander of the Atlantic Fleet complained of the shortage of officers and men afloat. One division lacked 1,350 men. Mine laying ships and destroyers had only seventy-five per cent. of their complement. The "battle efficiency inspection" revealed that a chief petty officer was in charge of one turret and an ensign just out of Annapolis of another. The Florida was short 29 officers, the Utah 28, the Michigan 21 and the South Carolina 16. Perhaps worst of all was the Admiral's discovery that a pay clerk and a yeoman were in charge of the plotting room of a dreadnought, in place of experienced commissioned officers. Admiral Fletcher—this is specially to be noted—said that in January, 1915, or a month after the report of Secretary Daniels was published, he complained of a shortage of 5,000 men, and it was even greater in the following summer.

The Admiral not only directed attention to the deficiency of the fleet in fast cruisers but pointed out that the submarines were not up to the mark and dependable. Their mobility, he said, was unsatisfactory and they had other limitations. The markmanship of the fleet came in for sharp criticism by Admiral Fletcher. He urged more time for big gun practice, and wanted authority to increase the range and use of full charges. Much of the backwardness in sea training of the enlisted men afloat Admiral Fletcher did not hesitate to say was due to the Secretary's fad of establishing schools on board to teach the men the three R's and make scholars of them.

Now let us turn to the report made by Secretary Daniels in December, 1914. It will be understood at once why he did not want Admiral Fletcher's annual report a few months later to see the light. In almost the first paragraph Mr. Daniels said that "in every line of progress and achievement it (the navy) has demonstrated its steady advance and efficiency." The service, he declared, was "up to its prescribed quota in numbers." The United States had "a submarine flotilla relatively and actually very powerful." Our submarines were "on a par with any in the world." More than ninety per cent. of the effective fighting power of the navy is now fully manned," was another of the Secretary's positive assertions. Of the schools afloat against which Admiral Fletcher protested Mr. Daniels said:

"The navy is coming to be 'the biggest university in America,' as it has been termed since the broadening and deepening of its educational system. 'Every ship a school' is now literally true."

In the building programme recommended not one scout cruiser was included, and only eight submarines, one seagoing, seven coast defence. Mr. Daniels interlarded his report with verses, quoted from Carlyle's "Hero Worship," spilled sentiment over page after page, glorified the Vera Cruz exploit, which he said has been "told in prose and in poetry," and wound up by saying that "this has been a proud and solemn year for the American navy." But nowhere in his report did Mr. Daniels show an intelligent knowledge of the navy or seem to realize its limitations and shortcomings.

The inescapable truth is that Josephus Daniels suppressed and concealed Admiral Fletcher's report because by contrast it would have revealed the glaring ignorance and utter incompetency of the official head of the navy. It was an outrage upon the people of the United States, who are entitled to know the state of the service at all times and to judge for themselves whether the Secreary is equal to his responsibilities and a help to or a drag on the navy. We do not hesitate to say that Josephus Daniels is the most unfit administrator of our first line of defence in living memory, and we know that he enjoys neither the confidence nor the respect of the rank and file. Except Mr. Bryan in his conduct of the State Department, no American has done the country greater injury than Josephus Daniels in the use of his power and opportunities as the head of the Navy Department. The service would rejoice and the country experience a sense of relief of he would resign an office for which he never had any qualifications.—N. Y. Sun.

THE COST OF PROGRESS

Some one has made the remark, "that so far as agriculture is concerned, there is expended a tremendous amount of talk, and writing, and educational effort for a very little real advancement among the farmers." Possibly this is true, but no more true in agriculture than in many other things. As a people, we are spending an enormous amount of money on school houses, books, apparatus, and teachers for what enlightenment we obtain.

And so in religion. Think of what the churches, and the preachers, and religious organizations cost for what real advancement in human goodness we can discern. But is it fair to ask if we could reasonably expect progress in these things which help make the sum of our civilization, in any other way? It so happens that we must pay pretty liberally for the privilege of living anyway, and the better, cleaner, and more intelligently we live, the more it costs. But it is worth the cost.—Hoard's Dairyman.

WHEN A VILLAGE FAILS

Sometimes a neighborhood shows a curious spirit of decadence, or backwardness in regard to its school, in such a town one will find many residences, and even barns better constructed than the school house, although the school house is built and cared for by the combined wealth of the whole town, while the individual properties were built by separate purses.

When a school is outgrown and the community doesn't grow in mind at a pace equal to the increase in population and equal the advance of ideas of other communities, it becomes necessary for the State Department of Education to write to the community's board of education a letter containing such expressions: "Unfit for further use for school purposes;" "inadequate in capacity" or so "that it has become necessary to place two of the grades on half time;" "in your high school department there is not a single suitable recitation room; the light is not up to the prescribed standard. The heating and ventilating is inadequate, some rooms seem to be ventilated hardly at all."

There isn't much glory for a village or district to receive such a characterization of its care for the children.—Utica Observer.

"THE HOG'S EYE IS SOT"

Candor is an uncommon quality in those who fight the obvious. In the matter of military preparedness, for instance, those who would blind the nation to the light of past experience and deafen it to the thunderous march of current events seldom bare those motives of political expediency, constitutional timidity or personal interest which lead them to stand for a policy of national disaster. Therefore recognition is due to Representative Frank Clark, of Florida, whose singleness of purpose in the matter of Congressional pork leads him to a heroic disregard of subterfuge.

Mr. Clark is for pork first, last and all the time. If there is anything left in the public Treasury after every boss-contractor back home has been satisfied through the exertions of his manikin in Congress, Mr. Clark has no particular objection to the surplus being directed to the maintenance of the integrity of the nation at large. In his speech in Congress defining his principles Mr. Clark indicated his alturistic attitude in the matter of pork by announcing that every town except one in his disrrict had had "its bit" in the shape of a public building. But are there no creeks to dredge for commerce that does not exist?

Mr. Clark wonders why "even the janitors and messengers of the executive departments no longer have respect for the House of Representatives."

He has said it.—N. Y. Herald.

SUNDAY SCHOOL AND PUGILISM

A. J. Drexel Biddle, Philadelphia's millionaire Bible school instructor has carried along his work so persistently that many churches now have Drexel Bible classes. Mr. Drexel's most noticeable characteristic is his interest in athletics. He is an expert boxer and on several occasions has stepped into a ring and fought professionals.

In addressing a Bible class which has been named for him recently Mr. Biddle told how he was won over to Sunday school work and of the power of self control. The latter was best gained by leading a true Christian life, he said, and added that he had acquired the art of boxing and through his work in the ring and elsewhere had been able to meet and bring into the church young men who would not have been attracted except by athletics. He had gone out into the highways and byways to get recruits and sometimes had met some pretty tough fellows, who, first attracted by athletics, had later yielded and become Christians.

Mr. Biddle also said he had knelt and prayed with young men before going into the ring for about, which to some persons might seem a very strange thing to do, but which he had found had brought good results. People made fun of him at first, he said, but when they learned that he was in earnest and was seeking first to win men for Christ, they forgot to laugh, and oftimes volunteered to help in the work for Christ. Numbered among the members of his Bible Class at one time, the speaker said, were 16 pugilists.—Batavia News

"ADS" MOLD OPINION, SAYS DEAN MATHEWS

Chicago—"Newspaper advertising," said Dean Shailer Mathews, of the University of Chicago, in addressing the Woodlawn Woman's Club, "is one of the strongest molders of public opinion in the world. Our habits of lift are largely controlled by such advertising. In obedience with the 'ads' we select our food, our clothing, our amusements."

Expanding a little on the subject of amusements, he said:

"It's all right to see a show like the 'Follies' once' but to see it more than once is demoralizing."

WANTS TO PAY PAPER BILL FORTY YEARS OLD

Carlisle, Pa.—A local newspaper has received the nucleus of a conscience fund, with the request from a man named Smith, Youngstown, O., for the name and address of the editor of the paper in 1876. Smith says that he was a subscriber to the paper forty years ago and got it for six months longer than he had paid. The extra dollar he owed worried him, he writes, and he wants to settle the account.

THE TAKING OF STINGAREE.

STINGAREE had crossed the Murray, and all Victoria was agog with the news. It was not his first descent upon that colony nor likely to be his last, unless Subinspector Kilbride and his mounted myrmidons did much better than they had done before. There is no stimulus, however, like a trembling reputation. Within four-and-twenty hours Kilbride himself was on the track of the invader, whose heels he had never seen, much less his face. And he rode alone.

Once, glancing through the woods, he saw several horsemen who had dismounted and were reading the latest exploits of the noted outlaw. He made a detour and escaped notice.

It was not merely his reputation that was at stake, though nothing could restore that more effectually than the single handed capture of so notorious a desperado as Stingaree. The dashing officer was not unnaturally actuated by the sum of £300 now set upon the outlaw's person, alive or dead. That would be a little windfall for one man, but not much to divide among five or six. On the other hand, and with all his faults, Subinspector Kilbride had courage enough to furnish forth a squadron. He was a black bearded, high cheeked Irish-Australian, keen and overeager to a disease, restless, irascible, but full of the fire and dash that make as dangerous an enemy as another good fighter need desire. And as a fine fighter in an infamous cause Stingaree had his admirers even in Victoria, where the old tale of popular sympathy with a picturesque rascal was responsible for not the least of the subinspector's difficulties. But even this struck Kilbride as yet another of those obstacles which were more easily surmounted alone than at the head of a talkative squad, and with that conviction he pushed his thoroughbred on and on through a whole cool night and three parts of an Australian summer's day. Imagine, then, his disgust at the apparition of a mounted trooper galloping to meet him in the middle of the afternoon and within a few miles of a former hiding place of the bushranger, where the senior officer had strong hopes of finding and surprising him now.

"Where the devil do you come from?" cried Kilbride as the other rode up.

"Jumping Creek," was the crisp reply. "Stationed there."

"Then why don't you stop there and do your duty?"

"Stingaree!" said the laconic trooper.

"What! Do you think you're after him too?"

"I am after him."

"So am I."

"Then you're going in the wrong direction."

Kilbride flushed a warm brown from beard to helmet.

"Do you know who you're speaking to?" cried he. "I'm Subinspector Kilbride, and this business is my business and no other man's in this colony. You go back to your barracks, sir! I'm not going to have every fool in the force charging about the country on his own account."

The trooper was a dark, smart, dapper young fellow of a type not easily browbeaten or subdued. And discipline is not the strong point of forces so irregular as the mounted police of a crescent colony. But nothing could have been more admirable than the manner in which this rebuke was received.

"Very well, sir, if you wish it. But I can assure you that you are off the track of Stingaree."

"How do you know?" asked Kilbride rudely, but he was beginning to look less black.

"I happen to know the place. You would have some difficulty in finding it if you never were there before. I only stumbled across it by accident myself."

"Lately?"

"One day last winter when I was out looking for some horses."

"And you kept it to yourself?"

The trooper hung his head. "I knew we should have him across the river again," he said. "It was only a question of time—and, well, sir, you can understand!"

"You were keen on taking him yourself, were you?"

"As keen as you are, Mr. Kilbride," owned the younger man, raising bold eyes and looking his superior fairly and squarely in the face.

Kilbride returned the stare, and what he saw unsettled him. The other was wiry, trim, eminently alert; he had the masterful mouth and the daredevil eye, and his horse seemed a part of himself. A more promising comrade at hot work was not to be desired, and the work would be hot if Stingaree had half a chance. After all, it was better for two to succeed than for one to fail. "Half the money and a whole skin!" said Kilbride to himself and rapped out his decision with an oath.

The trooper's eyes lit with reckless mirth, and a soft cheer came from under his breath.

"By the bye, what's your name," said Kilbride, "before we start?"

"Bowen—Jack Bowen."

"Then I know all about you. Why on earth didn't you tell me before? It was you who took that black fellow who murdered the shepherd on Woolshed creek, wasn't it?"

The admission was made with due modesty.

"Why, you're the very man for me!" Kilbride cried. "You show the way, Jack, and I'll make the going."

And off they went together at a canter, the slanting sun striking fire from their buttons and accouterments and lighting their sunburned faces as it lit the red stems and the white that raced past them on either side. For a little they followed the path which Kilbride had taken on his way thither; then the trooper plunged into the thick bush on the left, and the game became follow my leader, in and out, out and in, through a maze of red stems and of white, where the pungent eucalyptus scent hung as heavy as the sage green, perpendicular leaves themselves, and so onward until the subinspector called a halt.

"How far is it now, Bowen?"

"Two or three miles, sir."

"Good! It'll be light for another hour and a half. We'd better give the mokes a breather while we can. And there'd be no harm in two draws."

"I was just thinking the same thing, sir."

So their reins dangled while they cut up a pipeful of apparent shoe leather apiece, and presently the dull blue smoke was curling and circling against the dull green foliage, producing subtle half tint harmonies and momentary arabesques as the horses ambled neck and neck.

"Native of this colony?" puffed Kilbride.

"Well, no—old country originally, but I've been out some years."

"That's all right so long as you're not a New South Welshman," said Kilbride, with a chuckle. "I'll be shot if I wouldn't almost have turned you back if you had been!"

"Victoria is to have all the credit, is she, sir?"

"Anyhow, they shan't have any on the other side, or I'll know the reason!" the Victorian swore. "I—I—by Jove, I'd as lief lose my man again as let them have a hand in taking him!"

"But why?"

"Why? Do you live so near the border and can you ask? Did you never hear about a Sydney side drover blowing about his blooming colony? Haven't you heard of Sydney harbor till you're sick? And then their papers!" cried Kilbride, with columns in his tone. "But I'll have the last laugh yet! I swore I would, and I will! I swore I'd take Stingaree"—

"So I heard."

"Yes, they put it in their infernal papers! But it was true—take him I will!"

"Or die in the attempt, eh?"

"Yes."

All the bitterness of previous failure—indeed, of notorious and much criticised defeat—was in the subinspector's tone. That of his subordinate, though light as air, had a touch of insolence which an outsider could not have failed to detect, but Kilbride was too excited to do so. The outsider might possibly have foreseen a rivalry which no longer entered Kilbride's hot head.

Meanwhile the country was changing even with their now leisurely advance. The timbered flats in the region of the river had merged into a gully, which was rapidly developing into a gorge, with new luxuriant growths which added greatly to the density of the forest, suggesting its heart. The almost neutral eucalyptian tint was splashed with the gay hues of many parrots, as though the gum trees had burst into flower. The noise of running water stole gradually through the murmur of leaves. And suddenly an object in the grass struck the sight like a lantern flashed at dead of night. It proved to be an empty sardine tin pricked by a stray lance from the slanting sun.

"We must be near," whispered Kilbride.

"We are there! You hear the creek? He has a gunyah there; that's all. Shall we rush it on horseback or creep up on foot?"

"You know the lie of the land, Bowen. Which do you recommend?"

"Rushing it."

"Then here goes."

In a few seconds they had leaped their horses into a tiny clearing on the banks of a creek as relatively minute. And the gunyah—a mere funnel of boughs and leaves, in which a man could lie at full length, but only sit upright at the funnel's mouth—seemed as empty as the space on every hand. The only other sign of Stingaree was a hank of rope flung carelessly across the gunyah roof.

"He may be watching us from among the trees," muttered Kilbride, looking sharply about him. Bowen screwed up his eyes and followed suit.

"I hardly think it, Mr. Kilbride."

"But it's possible, and here we sit for him to pot us! Let's dismount whether or no."

They slid to the ground. The trooper found himself at the mouth of the gunyah.

"What if he were in there after all?" said he.

"He isn't," said Kilbride, stepping in front and stooping quickly. "But you might creep in, Jack, and see if he's left any sign of life behind him."

The men were standing between the horses, their revolvers cocked. Bowen's answer was to hand his weapon over to Kilbride and to creep into the gunyah on his hands and knees.

"Here's something or other," his voice cried thickly from within. "It's half buried. Wait a bit."

"As sharp as you can!"

"All right. But it's a box and jolly heavy."

Kilbride peered nervously to right, left and center; then his eyes fell upon his companion wriggling back into the open, a shallow, oblong box in his arms, its polish dimmed and dusted with the mold, as though they had violated a grave.

"Kick it open!" exclaimed Kilbride excitedly.

But there was no need for that. The box was not even locked, and the lifted lid revealed an inner one of glass protecting a brass cylinder with steel bristles in uneven growth and a long line of lilliputian hammers.

"A musical box!" said the staggered subinspector.

"That's it, sir. I remember hearing that he'd collared one in one of the stations he stuck up last time he was down here. It must have lain in the ground ever since. And it only shows how hard you must have pressed him, Mr. Kilbride."

"Yes. I headed him back across the Murray—I soon had him out o' this!" rejoined the other in grim bravado. "Anything else in the gunyah?"

"All he took that trip, I fancy, if we dig a bit. You never gave him time to roll his swag!"

"I must have a look," said Kilbride, his excitement fed by his reviving vanity.

The other questioned whether it were worth while. This settled the subinspector.

"There may be something to show where he's gone," that casuist suggested, "for I don't believe he's anywhere here."

"Shall I hold the shooters, sir?"

"Thanks. And keep your eyes open, just in case. But it's my opinion that the bird's flown somewhere else, and it's for us to find out where."

Kilbride then crept into the gunyah upon his hands and knees and found it less dark than he had supposed, the light filtering freely through the leaves and branches. At the inner extremity he found a mildewed blanket and the place where the musical box had evidently lain a long time, but there, though he delved to the elbows in the loosened earth, his discoveries ended. Puzzled and annoyed, Kilbride was on the verge of cursing his subordinate, when all at once he was given fresh cause. The musical box had burst into selections from "The Pirates of Penzance."

He Was Covered by Two Revolvers, One of Them His Own.

"What the deuce are you at?" shouted the irate officer.

"Only seeing how it goes."

"Stop it at once, you fool! He may hear it!"

"You said the bird had flown."

"You dare to argue with me? By thunder, you shall see!"

But it was Subinspector Kilbride who saw most. Backing precipitately out of the gunyah, he turned round before rising upright—and remained upon his knees after all. He was covered by two revolvers, one of them his own, and the face behind the barrels was the one with which the last hour had familiarized Kilbride. The only difference was the single eyeglass in the right eye. And the strains of the musical box, so thin and tinkling in the open air, filled the pause.

"What in blazes are you playing at?" laughed the luckless officer, feigning to treat the affair as a joke even while the iron truth was entering his soul by inches.

"Rise another inch without my leave and you may be in blazes to see!"

"Look here, Bowen, what do you mean?"

"Only that Stingaree happens to be at home after all, Mr. Kilbride."

The victim's grin was no longer forced; the situation made for laughter even if the laughter were hysterical, and for an instant it was given even to Kilbride to see the cruel humor of it. Then he realized all it meant to him—certain ruin or a sudden death—and the drops stood thick upon his skin.

"What of Bowen?" he at length asked hoarsely. The idea of another victim came as some slight alleviation of his own grotesque case.

"I didn't kill him," said Stingaree.

"Good!" said Kilbride. It was something that two of them should live to share the shame.

"But wing him I did," added the bushranger. "I couldn't help myself. The beggar put a bullet through my hat. He did well only to get one back in the leg."

Kilbride longed to be winged and wounded in his turn, since blood alone could lessen his disgrace. On cooler reflection, however, it was obviously wiser to feign a surrender more abject than it might finally prove to have been.

"Well," said Kilbride, "you have the whip hand over me this time, and I give you best. How long are you going to keep me on my knees?"

"You can get up when you like," replied Stingaree, "if you promise not to play the fool. So you were really going to take me this time, were you? I have really no desire to rub it in, but if I were you I should have kept that to myself until I'd done it. And you wanted to have me all to yourself? Well, you couldn't pay me a higher compliment, but I'm going to pay you a high one in return. You really did make me run for it last time and leave all sorts of things behind. So this time I mean to take them with me and leave you here instead. Nevertheless you're the only Victorian trap I have any respect for, Mr. Kilbride, or I shouldn't have gone to all this trouble to get you here."

Kilbride did not blanch, but he heard his apparent doom with a glittering eye and was deaf for a little to "The Pirates of Penzance."

"Oh, I'm not going to harm a good man like you," continued Stingaree, "unless you make me. Your friend Bowen made me, but I don't promise to fire low every time, mark you! There's another good man on the other side, Cairns by name. You know him, do you? He'll kick up his heels when he hears of this, but they do no better in New South Wales, so don't you let that worry you. To think you held both shooters at one stage of the game! I trusted you, and so you trusted me. If only you had known, eh? Hear that tune and know what it is? It's in your honor, Mr. Kilbride."

Placing both revolvers in his hip pocket, Stingaree then read carefully the latest bulletin of a reward for his capture, but before the tune ended, with a swift remorse induced by the dignity of Kilbride's bearing in humiliating disaster, he swooped upon the insolent instrument and stopped its tinkle by touching the lever with one revolver barrel while sedulously covering the sub-inspector with the other. The sudden cessation of the toy music, bringing back into undue prominence all the little bush noises which had filled the air before, brought home to Kilbride a position which he had subconsciously associated with those malevolent strains as something theatrical and unreal. He had known in his heart that it was real without grasping the reality until now. He flung up his fists in sudden entreaty.

"Put a bullet through me," he cried, "if you're a man!"

Stingaree shook a decisive head.

"Not if I can help it," said he. "But I fear I shall have to tie you up."

"That's slow death."

"It never has been yet, but you must take your chance. Get me that rope that's slung over the gunyah. It's got to be done."

Kilbride obeyed with apparent apathy, but his heart was inflamed with a sudden and infernal glow. Yes, it had never ended in death in any case that he could recall of this time honored trick of all the bush rangers; on the contrary, sooner or later most victims had contrived to release themselves. Well, one victim was going to complete his release by hanging himself by the same rope to the same tree. Meanwhile he confronted his captor grimly, the coil in both hands.

"There's a loop at one end," said Stingaree. "Stick your foot through it—either foot you like."

Kilbride obeyed, wondering whether his head would go through when its turn came.

"Now chuck me the other end."

It fell in coils at the bushranger's feet.

"Now stand up against that blue gum," he continued, pointing at the tree with Kilbride's revolver, his own being back at his hip, "and stand still like a sensible chap."

Stingaree then walked around and around the tree, paying out the long rope, yet keeping it taut, until it wound around tree and man from the latter's ankles to his armpits. Instinctively Kilbride had kept his arms free to the last, but they were no use to him in his suit of hemp, and one after the other his wrists were pinned and handcuffed behind the tree. The cold steel came as a shock. The captive had counted on loosening the knots by degrees, beginning with those about his hands. But there was no loosening steel gyves like these; he knew the feel of them too well; they were Kilbride's own, that he had brought with him for Stingaree. "Found 'em in your saddlebags while you were in my gunyah," explained the bushranger, stepping around to survey his handiwork. "Sorry to sear the kid, so to speak. But you see you were my most dangerous enemy on this side of the Murray."

The enemy did not look very dangerous as he stood in the dusk in the very heart of that forest, lashed to that tree, with his finger tips not quite meeting behind it and the blood already on his wrists.

"And now?" he whispered, hoarse already, his lips cracking and his throat parched.

"I shall give you a drink before I go."

"I won't take one from you!"

"I shall make you if I have to be a bigger brute than ever. You must live to spin this yarn!"

"Never!"

Stingaree smiled to himself as he produced pipe and tobacco, but it was not his sinister smile; it was rather that of the victor who salutes the vanquished in his heart. Meanwhile a more striking and a more subtle change had come over the face of Kilbride. It was not joy, but it was quite a new grimness, and in his own preoccupation the bushranger did not notice it at all. He sauntered near with his knife and his tobacco plug, and there was some compassion in his pensive stare.

"Cheer up, man!" said he. "There's no disgrace in coming out second best to me. You may smile. You'll find it's generally admitted in New South Wales. And, after all, you needn't tell little crooked Cairns how it happened. So that stops your smile! But he's the best man left on my tracks and I

"Hands up and empty, Stingaree, or you're the next dead man."

shouldn't be surprised if he's the first to find you."

"No more should I!" said a harsh voice behind the bushranger. "Hands up and empty, Stingaree, or you're the next dead man in this little colony!"

Quick as thought Stingaree stepped in front of the tied Victorian. But his hands were up and his eyeglass dangling on its string.

"Oh, you don't catch me kill two birds," rasped the newcomer's voice, "though I'm not sure which of you would be least loss!"

Stingaree stood aside once more and waved his hands without lowering them, bowing from his captor to his captive as he did so.

"Superintendent Cairns of New South Wales—Inspector Kilbride of Victoria," said he. "You two men will be glad to know each other."

The New South Welshman drawled out a dry expression of his own satisfaction. His was a strange and striking personality. Dark as a mulatto and round shouldered to the extent of some distinct deformity, he carried his eyes high under the lids and shot his piercing glance from under the penthouse of a beetling brow. A lipless mouth was pursed in such a fashion as to shorten the upper lip and exaggerate an already powerful chin. And this stooping and intent carriage was no less suggestive of the human sleuth hound than were the veiled vigilance and dogged determination of the lowered face. Such was the man who had succeeded where Kilbride had failed—succeeded at the most humiliating moment of that most ignominious failure—and who came unwarrantably from the wrong side of the Murray. The Victorian stood in his bonds and favored his rival with such a glare as he had not leveled at Stingaree himself. But not a syllable did Kilbride vouchsafe. And the superintendent was fully occupied with his prisoner.

"'Little crooked Cairns,' am I? There are those that look a jolly sight smaller, and'll have a worse hump than mine for the rest of their born days! Come nearer and turn your back."

And the revolver was withdrawn from its carrier on the stolen constabulary belt. The bushranger was then searched for other weapons, then marched into the bush at the pistol's point and brought back handcuffed to the superintendent's bridle.

"That's the way you'll come marching home, my boy, and one of us on horseback each side. Don't trust you in a saddle on a dark night!"

Indeed, it was nearly dark already, and in the nebulous middle distance a laughing jackass was indulging in his evening peal. Cairns jerked his head in the direction of the unearthly cackle. "Lots of 'em down here in Vic, I believe," said he and at length turned his attention to the bound man. "You see, I wanted to land him alive and kicking without spilling blood," he continued, opening his knife. "That was why I had to let him tie you up."

"You let him?" thundered the Victorian, breaking his silence with a bellow. It was as though the man with the knife had cut through the rope into the bound man's body.

"Stand still," said he, "or I may hurt you. I had to let him, my good fellow, or we'd have been dropping each other like bullocks. As it is, not a scratch between us, though I found young Bowen in a pretty bad way. Our friend had stuck up Jumping Creek barracks in the small hours, put a bullet through Bowen's leg and come away in his uniform. Pretty tall, that, eh? I shouldn't wonder if you'd swing him for it alone down here in Vic. No doubt you've got to be more severe in a young colony. Well, I tracked my gentleman to the barracks, and I found Bowen in his blood, sent my trooper for a doctor and got on your tracks before they were half an hour old. I came up with you just as he'd stuck you up. He had one in each hand. It wasn't quite good enough at the moment."

The knife tore through the rope for the last time, and it lay in short ends all round the tree.

"Now my hands!" cried Kilbride fiercely.

"I beg pardon?" said the satirical superintendent.

"My hands, I tell you!"

"There's a little word they teach 'em to say at our state schools. Perhaps you never heard it down in Vic."

"Don't be a silly fool," said Kilbride wearily. "You haven't been through what I have!"

"That's true," said Cairns. "Still you might be decently civil to the man that gets you out of a mess."

Nevertheless the handcuffs were immediately removed, and that instant, with the curtest thanks, Subinspector Kilbride sprang forward with such vigorous intent that the other detained him forcibly by one of his stiff and aching arms.

"What are you after now, Kilbride?"

"My prisoner!"

"Your what?"

"My prisoner," I said.

"I like that—and you his!"

Kilbride burst into a voluble defense of his position.

"What right have you on this side of the Murray, you Sidney sider? None at all except as a passenger. You can't lay finger on man, woman or child in this colony, and you sha'n't! Nor yet upon the three hundred there's on his head, and the sons of convicts down in Sydney can put that in their pipe and smoke it!"

For all his cool and ready insolence the misshapen superintendent from the other side stood dazed and bewildered by this volcanic outpouring. Then his dark face flushed darker, and with a snarl he clinched his fists. The Victorian, however, had turned on his heel, and now his liberated hands flew skyward as though the bush ranger's revolver covered him yet again.

But there was no such weapon discernible through the shade; no New South Welshman's horse and neither sight, sound, wraith nor echo of Stingaree, the outlawed bushranger, the terror and the despair of the sister colonies!

"I thought it might be done when I saw how you tied him," said Kilbride cheerfully. "Those beggars can ride lying down or standing up."

"I believe you saw him clear."

"I'll settle that with you when I've caught him."

"You catch him, you gumsucker, when you as good as let him go."

And a volley of further and far more trenchant abuse was discharged by Superintendent Cairns of the New South Wales police. But Kilbride was already in the saddle; a covert outward kick with his spurred heel, and the third horse went cantering riderless into the trees.

"He won't go far," sang the subinspector, "and he'll take you safe back to barracks if you give him his head. It's easy to get bushed in this country—for new chums from penal settlements."

As the Victorian galloped into darkness and the New South Welshman dashed wildly after the third horse the laughing jackass in the invisible middle distance gave his last grotesque guffaw at departed day. And the laughing jackass is a Victorian bird.

BEST METHOD OF COOKING "LIMAS"

Food experts have long been insisting upon the importance of dried beans, peas, cowpeas, and similar legumes, and in one form or another such foods are an accepted part of the diet in most families. In order that she may make the diet varied, it is to the housekeeper's advantage to know a number of good ways of serving such foods, and so the home economics experts of the department have made some suggestions based upon their studies of foods and their uses in the home.

Fresh green Lima beans when at their best have a delicate, spicy, or pungent flavor, which to some palates, at least, suggests curry, a fairly well-known (any grocer can get it) though not very common spice, which is perhaps most familiar in such dishes as "curried lamb" or "curried veal." This suggested the possible use of curry as a seasoning for Lima beans, and the tests which have been made gave very satisfactory results with dried and canned as well as with fresh beans. When preparing dried Lima beans, soak them for an hour or two (or even longer), according to dryness, and cook until tender. Then add the curry powder (in the proportion of one-half teaspoonful (level) to each pound of dried beans) rubbed into a tablespoonful of butter and mixed with a few spoonfuls of hot water. Add salt and pepper to taste and cook slowly until the curry flavor is well distributed through the beans.

That the method can also be followed with good results in preparing canned Lima beans for the table is of interest to housekeepers as well as to the canning clubs organized as a part of the department work and for whom some special studies of the use of canned vegetables have been undertaken. In this case, as with dried beans, the amount of curry powder should be just sufficient to give a delicate flavor. A quarter of a teaspoonful (level) is sufficient for a quart can of beans.

For variety a little onion may be used, with or without curry. Cut the onion very fine, cook it in a covered stewpan with a little butter and a few tablespoonfuls of water until it is tender, and then add to the beans.

Another good combination is canned Lima beans with pimientos or sweet peppers, with or without the addition of the finely chopped onion, cooked until it is tender. The pimientos, because of their red color, add to the attractiveness of the dish as well as to the flavor. One-half of a good-sized pepper, cut into small pieces, is sufficient for a quart can of beans. Stir into the beans and cook with them long enough to distribute the flavor through the beans.

BAD GUARDING LOST BIG GAME

Close Work by Both Teams at Beginning Kept the Audience Guessing---Turners Finally Triumphed.

"Speed merchants," termed the Syracuse Turners furnished several hundred spectators in Church's hall last night with a good exhibition of the court game and incidently trimmed the local outfit to the tune of 37-21.

The game was one of the most interesting played this season, notwithstanding the one sideness of the score and the entire Maccabee team was in the play every minut. In following the ball, it can be safely said that the Maccabees were superior to the visitors, but bad luck in shooting as well as laxity in guarding made the defeat possible.

Although Hurst and Heis were the chief point earners of the Turners, a greater share of the credit for the victory is due to the guarding of Geiger and Shiebel who time and again interfered with a sure shot by the local forwards.

The first five minutes of the game proved to be the most interesting, neither team being able to find the basket. Rapid passwork in which both teams figured to a large extent, close guarding, and close following of the ball prevented scores by either team. During this period, the Maccabees easily excelled the visitors in all depart ents as the local team was in possession of the ball three-quarters of the time but opportunities to score were lost by careless shooting.

The first half closed with the score 19-5 in favor of the Syracusans, but at the beginning of the second period the local team braced up and took a shut out of the visitors. O'Brien, Ives and Ward scored baskets in rapid succession until the middle of eighteen points.

In a preliminary game, which had a finish to it dissimilar to the other games which have been staged prior to them ain event, the Tigers defeated the Baptist Boy Scouts 32-16. Murphy, of the Tigers was easily the star of the game, his guarding being of excellent quality and he was responsible for practically all of the scoring of his team. The youngster advanced the ball down the flood repeatedly and "fed" his forwards.

The lineup in the Maccabee-Turner game was:

| Maccabees | | Turners |
|---|---|---|
| Ives | Left Forward | Hurst |
| O'Brien | Right Forward | Hefferman |
| Crockett | Center | Heis |
| Snow | Left Guard | Geiger |
| Ward | Right Guard | Shieler |

Referee—Hollingsworth.

In the preliminary event the lineup was:

| Baptist Scouts | | Tigers |
|---|---|---|
| Childs | Right Forward | Larabee |
| Hinsdale | Left Forward | Barnes |
| Parks | Center | Waterhouse |
| Youmans | Left Guard | Murphy |
| Streeter | Right Guard | Hill-Palmer |

"MISTAKE" MADE $2,500.

War Brings Profits to Gamer, Who Ordered Too Much Chloride.

Parsons, Kan.—Anton Gamer, a dry cleaner, through a mistake ordered 100 instead of ten gallons of carbon tetrachloride to be used in his cleaning process last February, paying $1.29 a gallon.

He attempted to persuade the drug company to take back the ninety gallons, but it refused, and he figured he had lost over a hundred dollars in the transaction.

The war in the meantime caused the price of the chemical to soar, and recently the chemical company of whom he bought the order paid him $30.15 a gallon for the ninety gallons it refused almost a year ago. Gamer netted a profit of more than $2,500.

RAISE A COW, SWEDE SAYS, AND GET RICH

Treat Her Right and You'll Be Rewarded.

St. Paul—Raise up a cow in the way she should go, and before she is old she will richly reward you.

C. N. Nelson, who lives just over the Anoka county line, a few miles from St. Paul, says.

Thirty-two years ago, when he was in the early twenties, Nelson landed in Minnesota fresh from Sweden. His total assets were 50 cents and the contents of a queer looking Swedish clothes chest. Half an hour after his arrival he was 50 cents poorer.

"When I got off a train in Minneapolis all I had to direct me was a card bearing the address of a cousin who had come to America a short time before," Mr. Nelson said. "I showed the card to a hackman, who also was Swedish. He took my 50 cents and drove me a few blocks, pointing to one of the windows, marked 444, said, 'There it is.' I had supposed that the 'box 444' written on the card was a street address. I did not know how my cousin was to appear from that box, but I stood with eyes glued on the number from 10 o'clock in the morning until the middle of the afternoon, afraid to look elsewhere for fear my cousin would come in the meantime.

"When at last I heard two men at one of the windows talking my language I told them my story. They explained that I was in the postoffice and that my cousin might not go there for several days. I should have been in a bad fix had not one of the men invited me to come and do odd jobs at his boarding house and earn my keep.

"My cousin did not come to town for three weeks, and when he did he did not help me because he could not. He had all he could do to earn a living.

"Then I worked in a railroad construction camp one summer and returned to the city with the intention of going to school and learning English. My first employer agreed to give me my board for helping with the milking, but I had not gone to school many days when he met with an accident. He persuaded me that I would learn English faster driving a milk route than by going to school, so I became a dairyman and worked until I had saved $1,000."

JUDGE A MODEL MAN.

Eighty-four and Promised Lincoln Not to Smoke, Chew, Drink or Lie.

Chester, Pa.—Federal Judge Simeon Woodrow King of Chicago, who paid a visit to relatives in this city, is a remarkable man. He is in his eighty-fourth year and has never been sick a day in his life.

He was appointed judge for the United States court for the northern district of Illinois when he was twenty-one years and six months of age by President Abraham Lincoln and has been sitting as a jurist all that long period.

"I have kept the promise I made to Abraham Lincoln," Judge King says, "and that promise was that I would never smoke or chew tobacco, never touch liquor and never tell an untruth."

Fifty Years Near Father; Didn't Know.

Columbus, Ind.—Mrs. Margaret Jane Cathers, eighty, of near Newbern, has just learned that she is a daughter of Drewery A. Massey, 108 years old, who recently died in Rush county, and that she lived within fifty miles of him for half a century without knowing his whereabouts.

A Great Chess Player.

Sir Walter Parratt had an extraordinary memory. Some eight or ten men were assembled one evening in one of the lodges attached to St. Michael's college, Tenbury. Sir Walter Parratt and Herr von Holst played in turn upon the piano such music as was asked for. This went on for some time until at last the chessboard was brought out. Sir Walter then proposed to play two men at chess in consultation, still remaining at the piano and playing from memory what was demanded either from Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Chopin or Mendelssohn. Without even a glance at the chessboard he won the game in an hour.—London Globe.

TURNED THE LAUGH.

Tom Marshall's Ready Wit Saved Him When He Was Cornered.

Tom Marshall of Kentucky, who flourished as an orator and wit in the last century, was a gallant gentleman who, opportunity offering, distributed his osculatory activities without regard to age, race or previous condition of servitude.

One Christmas eve the gallant Tom met in the hall the pretty octoroon slave maid of Miss Breckinridge, a society leader and belle. Tom promptly kissed the maid and then expressed his appreciation by giving her for a Christmas present what he supposed was a twenty dollar gold piece. In fact, it was a gold medal that had been presented to him by the citizens of Frankfort, Ky., for some services rendered to that burg.

The girl tried to change the gold piece, when the storekeeper, supposing it to be stolen, impounded it and gave it to her mistress. The girl, being called to account, admitted that it was a Christmas gift from Mr. Marshall and confessed that the hall was dark and that Tom kissed her before she could help it.

Miss Breckinridge determined to give Mr. Marshall a lesson in good manners, so that evening at a brilliant social function she assembled half a dozen Louisiana belles about her and, calling Tom to the group, handed him the medal and said: "Mr. Marshall, here is something you parted with in the dark. It is restored to you in the light." Tom replied promptly: "It was dark sure enough; but, believe me, Miss Breckinridge, if I had known it was you I wouldn't have given you a cent."—Los Angeles Times.

The big man is not always as healthy as his size might indicate. In fact he often complains of the way he is feeling, and his small companion takes him to task for doing so. This occurred the other day within hearing of a crowd on a street corner.

They met there, and the little fellow asked:

"Well, how are you feeling today?"

"I'm about half sick," was the reply.

"Go on, man," cried the little fellow, who could see nothing wrong with his friend. "Even if you're half sick there's more of you well right now than there is of me."—Exchange.

The Law of the Sea.

There was a very bad first night in a New York theater—that is to say, the night was a good night as nights go in New York during the theatrical season, but the play that had been offered was bad.

At the end of the second act the long suffering audience was about ready to quit. A few got up to go, and others followed until the aisles became congested.

Charles Hanson Towne arose in his place well down in front.

"Wait!" he called out in a clear, loud tone. "Women and children first!"—Saturday Evening Post.

A Lincoln Comment.

In "The Life and Letters of John Hay" is this diary entry which gives a typical glimpse of Lincoln:

"I said to the president today that I thought Butler was the only man in the army in whom power would be dangerous. McClellan was too timid and vacillating to usurp; Grant was too sound and cool headed and unselfish; Banks also; Fremont would be dangerous if he had more ability and energy.

"'Yes,' says the president, 'he is like Jim Jett's brother. Jim used to say that his brother was the darnedest scoundrel that ever lived, but in the infinite mercy of Providence he was also the darnedest fool.'"

FOOD AND CHARACTER.

How Different Diets Bring Out Various Traits In Nations.

It is proved that today the wheat eating nations lead the meat eating nations. There are some interesting observations on the subject.

The succulence and flavor of meat depend not only upon careful cooking, but on what the animal was fed with. In the same way the meat and food we eat influence our characters.

Englishmen are "beef fed," and to that they owe their stolid and tolerant characters, slow to move to enthusiasm, with a great liking for compromise and toleration and a big facility for forgiveness.

The porridge of the Scot makes him argumentative and opinionated, and the restless vivacity of the Irishman is due to his potato diet.

A famous actor carried his belief in the influence of food so far as to vary his menu according to the character he was playing, eating pork for tyrants, beef for murderers and mutton for lovers.

This may have been taking matters to extremes, but it is a fact that mutton lovers are generally of a quiet temperament and given to sentiment, while big beef eaters are more often than not of a choleric, fierce character.

Observations of regular pork eaters have not justified the allegation that they are tyrannical, but certainly pork is different from other meats, and noted bullies have been extraordinarily fond of pork chops. Fat bacon produces a lethargic character—slow in thought and action.

It is alleged that vegetarianism makes clear thinkers, but moody characters.

Last, but not least, big bread eaters are of a dominating character and become natural leaders.

Sift the sugar into the beaten whites of eggs. Make three layers. For top icing use confectioner's sugar wet with the clear coffee saved.

Coffee Filling.—Two teaspoonfuls of coffee, two-thirds cupful of cold water. Steep ten minutes and strain in coffee cup, saving one tablespoonful in another dish and fill cup with milk. Mix yolks of two eggs, two tablespoonfuls of flour, one-half cupful of sugar, one tablespoonful of melted butter. Add to coffee and cook in double boiler as you would a boiled custard.

The ends are quite heavy enough for all purposes, and the coloring of the china is particularly attrac-

CLEAN CARPETS.

Hints For Those Who Prefer Carpets to Rugs

HOW THE DIRT WILL VANISH.

A Practical Housekeeper Tells How She Keeps Her Floors Looking Well In Spite of a Big Family—Also the Ingredients of a General Cleanser.

A woman who always has clean, bright, fresh looking carpets, despite the wear and tear of a big family, tells how she keeps them so.

"To begin with," she states, "I buy good bristle carpet brooms, have them regularly washed and either hang them up or stand them bristles upward—never with the bristles on the floor.

"Any stains or marks on my carpets are attended to at once.

"In the case of a fall of soot you should cover thickly with salt and sweep up immediately. Should ink be spilled on a carpet waste no time, but sop up quickly with blotting paper, then wash out with warm, soft water and a clean flannel and dry with a soft duster. If the stains be obstinate put a teaspoonful of salt in a cupful of milk and rub well in.

"For dirty boot or sticky marks I use ammonia. If it should seem to fade the color this is easily restored by rubbing with chloroform. A cloth wrung out of salt and water brings up the colors after sweeping.

"If candle or other grease is spilled you can easily remove it by putting a sheet of clean blotting paper over the marks and ironing with a hot iron, shifting the paper to absorb.

"To clean and brighten dingy rugs and stair carpets I get a half pint of ox gall from my butcher and mix it with half a pail of cold soft water. Rub the mixture on with a soft scrubbing brush, then sponge the lather off with clean water, rubbing with a cloth.

"Thick carpets and Indian rugs should be swept the way of the nap, and, unlike other rugs, the Indian ones should only be swept, not shaken.

"Here is an infallible general cleaner: Take one pound of any pure white soap and shave it fine. Place this in one gallon of boiling water, stir over a moderate fire until the soap is dissolved; then remove from the fire, stir well and let it stand to cool for thirty minutes. At the end of that time add the following ingredients: One-half ounce sulphuric ether, one ounce alcohol, two ounces ammonia and one and one-half ounces pulverized borax. Let the fluid stand twenty-four hours before using. With the fluid and a brush scrub the carpet, then rinse with clean water and a sponge."

Landing of the Pilgrims.

Already various plans are mooted for celebrating in 1920 the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the pilgrims. Long Island's Canal Project.

Long Island is agitating a project for constructing a canal along the south shore to connect the great bays for a distance of 120 miles. It would reach New York harbor through Jamaica bay. ### PRACTICAL HEALTH HINT.

Let the Baby Alone.

Next to cleanliness, which includes purity of food, possibly the most important thing in the care of a baby is the vital piece of negative advice—let it alone. It is doubtful if there is any other one thing which really does more harm to the baby and, ultimately, to the adult and to the race, than the neglect of this rule. The most vital part of the baby is its brain and its nervous system. The growth and development of its entire body is the direct result of the sensory impression received and recorded upon the brain. Even with the utmost quiet possible it is perfectly appalling to attempt to imagine the vast and constant stream of violent sensations received by an infant which has just made its entrance into a new world full of noise and moving things. Babies should never be played with, should never be bounced, trotted nor sung to, and never should be given noisy or complicated toys. They should not be exhibited to strangers nor taken where there are many persons. Excess of sensory impulses produced from such causes lead up to the nervous diseases and the peculiar weaknesses which characterize the American people.

Gown of Scarlet Velvet and Chinchilla Worn by Mrs. Vernon Castle

Designed by Hickson, New York.

A GOWN designed by Hickson for Mrs. Vernon Castle is what Hickson calls the scarlet tanager, as the wrap is of scarlet velvet, with a novel stole and cape, to say nothing of a flounce of chinchilla. There are big, wide cuffs which could replace a muff, and the enormous fur collar can be worn at any height, as both sides are of fur. The modest price of this bit of gorgeousness is $1,000.

• • •

Black furs for the moment seem to be a discarded vogue. Gray furs of every shade imaginable are the high style factors of fur vogues for this season. Gray fox and krimmer, astrakhan and dyed furs are most important, with squirrel and chinchilla stripes introduced as novelties of high and low degree. As for muffs, they are of all sorts, both grave and gay.

• • •

Narrow pleatings of taffeta are still much used for trimming both on silk and serge.

• • •

Kid ornaments for trimming tailored hats are in good style.

• • •

A new black velvet toque is made with a long tam-o'-shanter crown, the end of which is wound about the throat. There is a fur tassel on the end and a fur band around the toque.

• • •

With the returned vogue for high collars, many of the detachable sort are sold in the shops. Some are made with extensions over the front of the bodice something in the manner of jabots. One of these shows a wide band of lace insertion for the base of the collar, with shirred georgette crape for the top and a frill of lace and crape at the front.

• • •

For sports the smartest things in stockings are those of very heavy silk, striped in two or sometimes three colors—purple, green and black, for instance, or blue, purple and green.

• • •

Brocade is used for boudoir slippers. The main color of the brocade should of course match the boudoir gown, and sometimes the brocaded silk slippers match the upholstery of the boudoir itself.

• • •

Suede and leather are used for sports clothes of various sorts. A suede jacket is especially suitable for skating, as it is light, yet quite impervious to cold. It is thin and snug and can therefore be worn under a coat or jacket without adding bulkiness. Suede and leather must, of course, be made in strictly tailored fashion, depending on straps and stitching and pockets for trimming.

Evening Gown With Charming New Sleeves.

The winged sleeves of chiffon give the "something different" air to this frock of white satin chine. A vest of silver lace is also a prominent detail of the bodice.

When in quest of an evening gown, be sure to select something novel, even though the novelty of the design is achieved through the smallest detail. Flowing sleeves of chiffon strike the unusual note in this evening frock of white satin crepe. The skirt has a simple tunic gathered at the waist-line and joined to the bodice under a soft girdle of self-material. A satin cord outlines the pointed outer-front, while the round neck and upper sleeves are hemstitched.

In medium size the costume requires 7 yards 36-inch crepe, with 2⅝ yards 36-inch chiffon for the wing sleeves.

The process of cutting is greatly simplified because the underbody back and front are cut in one piece. This section of the pattern is laid on a lengthwise fold of the material, and to the right of it is placed the upper sleeve, on a lengthwise thread. The collar and peplum are also laid on a lengthwise fold, but between these are sandwiched the outer front of the bodice, laid on a lengthwise thread. The back and the cuff are also laid on a lengthwise thread. The winged sleeves are not included in the pattern, but may be cut in triangular shape and draped to suit the fancy.

For round or V-shaped neck, cut out neck edge of underbody on indicating single small "o" perforations. If desired without sleeves entirely, cut out along small "o" perforations near the arm-hole.

When the sleeves are omitted straps of velvet or satin are substituted. They are draped low over the arm and edged, perhaps with one or two lace frills.

The Scrap Book

How Gene Field Resigned.

When Eugene Field was working on the old Kansas City Times, according to the story told by a Kansas City man who knew him, the Denver Tribune decided to make a bid for his services. This was in Field's youth, when his fame was just budding and before his flowering period in Chicago. The Denver paper obtained Field's services, as is well known, and the Kansas City man who tells the story was instrumental in bringing it about. He came here from Denver, authorized to offer Field a larger salary. Field was sitting at his desk, coat off, collar loosened, his feet in carpet slippers. The messenger transmitted the Denver offer, and Field, without commenting on it, began to inquire after mutual friends and acquaintances. Meanwhile Field took off his carpet slippers and began drawing on his shoes.

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" said the visitor impatiently, referring to the offer which Field so far had not commented on.

"The devil, man," said Field as he stood up and threw his discarded slippers into a far corner. "Can't you see I'm resigning now?"—Kansas City Star.

"Life."

A crust of bread and a corner to sleep in;
A minute to smile and an hour to weep in;
A pint of joy to a peck of trouble,
And never a laugh, but moans come double,
And that is life.

A crust and a corner that love makes precious,
With the smiles to warm and the tears to refresh us,
And joy seems sweeter when cares come after,
And a moan is the finest of foils for laughter,
And that is life.

—Paul Laurence Dunbar.

Beans!

Senator Hoar used to tell with glee of a southerner just home from a visit to New England who said to his friend: "You know those little white round beans?" "Yes," replied the friend, "the kind we feed to our horses?" "The very same. Well, do you know, suh, that in Boston the enlightened citizens take those little white round beans, boil them for three or four hours, mix them with molasses and I know not what other ingredients, bake them, and then—what do you suppose they do with the beans?"

"They"—

"They eat 'em, suh," interrupted the first southerner impressively. "Suh, they eat 'em!"

The "Long" Sitzes.

The Sitze family was long in person, long drawn out in speech and eternally long about doing things. Over miles of pine hills they were known as the "long" Sitzes. Miss Lydia, the eldest, went to a crossroads store to buy Christmas presents. In the course of a half hour she became interested in some blue and scarlet petticoats.

"I'll take one of these petticoats," she said, slowly counting out the price.

The busy proprietor wrapped up the parcel and handed it over with a polite "Something else?"

"I'll take another petticoat."

He did up a second bundle, took her carefully counted money and was turning to the next impatient customer.

"I'll take another petticoat," came the slow drawl.

This went on to the seventh time. The man, being up to his ears in work, ventured a question:

"Buying for the neighborhood, Miss Lydia?"

"I'm buying two apiece for my sisters."

"How many sisters have you?"

"Nine."—Youth's Companion.

A Curious Echo.

Among the most noted echoes is that heard from the suspension bridge across the Menai strait. The sound of a blow from a hammer on one of the main piers of the structure is returned in succession from each of the crossbeams that support the roadway and from the opposite pier at the distance of 576 feet, in addition to which the sound is many times repeated between the water and the roadway at the rate of twenty-eight times in five seconds.

LABOR'S RIGHT.

The trade union movement has always maintained that the fundamental right that must be assured to all free workingmen is the right to control their labor power, their creative ability. This power is essentially personal, inseparable from mind and inseparable from the brain and the muscles and the living body of the workers. Control over labor power means control over the individual. It is for this reason that the workers of the trade union movement refuse to delegate this control to any outside authority, even temporarily. We maintain, and rightfully maintain, that the minute this power is vested in an outside authority, that moment freedom ceases. Free workers cannot be free at one time and under the control of an outside authority at another time, or, to use the well known phrase, the workers cannot exist part free and part slave.—Samuel Gompers.

For those who delight in silken lingerie this fichu corset cover of silk crepe de chine trimmed with embroidery and taffeta petticoat are interesting. Breechloading in artillery and small arms is popularly supposed to be an invention of the middle of the last century, but such is by no means the case. There will be from one to five blossoms on it every morning, which will look wonderfully bright and cheerful on the breakfast table on cold winter mornings. When the sun is not too bright they sometimes stay out all day. They seem to stand the cold well, they are not easily frozen.

F. H. S. SHOULD DOWN SOLVAY

Following the defeats of the past few weeks, the High School basketball squad and its supporters are anxious to see the tea m"make good" during the rest of the season. A victory over the Solvay High five, who oppose the locals on the City Hall court tonight, is looked forward to with a lot of anxiety.

From advance information, the visitors cannot be classed as champions, although credited with having an evenly balanced team, with no individual stars. In weight, thel ocal boys will have an advantage and owing to then ature of the local court. this fact may have a direct bearing on the final outcome of theg ame.

Harold Martin, recently appointed captain, is likely to make a shift in the lineup of his team owing to the inability of Reynolds to play.

Thewast improvement shown by Martin and Frawley since the first of the season has been plainly noticeable and both boys are considered the two mast valuable men on the team. Martin, in the forward position, in the last few games has followed the ball with such persistance as to be in the ploy practicall ytwice as much as any of the other men. Frawley's guarding is good, while his ability to find the basket is shown in the practice sessions.

The game tonight will start promptly at 8 oclock.

Our Washington Letter

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE

Washington—Word comes from New Jersey that a committee of ten Democrats—five Wilson men and five anti-Wilson men—has been formed to discuss and, if possible, to dispose of the problems which divide the party in that state. The equal division of the committee membership is taken here to indicate that the President's opponents at home are as numerous as his friends; and it bears out the reports which have been coming to Washington from New Jersey for some time past.

This unique arrangement was made by the President's secretary, Mr. Tumulty, who used a part of his Christmas holidays in a trip to Trenton to proclaim the glad tidings of peace among New Jersey Democrats. His words fell on deaf ears. Two factions were full of fight to be pacified,—and, in addition, the anti-Wilson party are looking beyond the election of next fall. They frankly express their doubts of Democratic success and they are looking out for Number One. Wilson will not be re-elected, they argue, he may not even be renominated. After his defeat he will go to New York to live, engaging in literary work—unless he decides to go into the jewelry business in Washington. At any rate, he will be through with New Jersey, but we shall still be here. There will continue to be some local political spoils worth having. There will be some Democratic mayors, some Democratic members of the legislature, some Democratic appointments to state boards, the courts, and the like. The plums will go to whoever controls the party organization, and we intend to be those fortunate persons. If we surrender to the Wilson crowd they will enjoy the fruits of political manipulation which may fall to the minority party.

Mr. Tumulty argued diligently to enforce the President's authority, but he was unable to convince the recalcitrants that Wilson is to be a second-time winner. Accordingly, the most he could accomplish was the formation of this unique arrangement of a political "holding company," with the stock split fifty-fifty between Wilson and his enemies. The New Jersey delegates at St. Louis will be for Wilson, of course, if he is a candidate—but the Democratic party in New Jersey is no longer for Wilson.

S. C. Dutcher, of Oswego, was elected president of the Past Grands' Association of Oswego county at the annual meeting held in Parish Wednesday.

R. A. Coulson of Oswego was chosen as treasurer of the association. Other officers elected were: vice-president, W. H. Sherman of Mexico; and secretary, R. W. Edick, of Parish. The next annual meeting will be held in the rooms of Oswegatchie lodge on the fourth Wednesday in January, 1917.

Upwards of fifty past grands were in attendance, and Judge Edgar S. Mosher, P. D. G. M., and Lynton G. Kelley of Auburn, Charles F. Wright, P. G. P., L. Earl Higby, P. G., and Robert W. Ellis, P. G., of Syracuse, past district deputies, A. W. Wright of Richland and E. A. Blair of Cleveland were guests of the association.

Judge Mosher spoke on the work of the Grand Lodge committee on Historical Research, of which he is chairman. His address covered the results attained and the necessity for data as the centenary of the order approaches. Charles F. Wright and I. Earl Higby and Robert W. Ellis spoke on the Grand Lodge session held at Syracuse last August and of the effects of the recent Billy Sunday revival on Odd Fellowship. Lynton G. Kelley addressed the convention on "The Organization Work of the Odd Fellow Relief Association of Cayuga County."

The convention named a committee to investigate the question of a relief association for Oswego county similar to that of Cayuga county.

Ten past grands were admitted to membership, including William Edick, Newton Edick, Charles Allen, Charles Casler and Ray Welden of Parish. The association unanimously indorsed Judge Edgar S. Mosher of Auburn for grand warden of the Grand Lodge, to be elected at the meeting of the Grand Lodge in June. Judge Mosher is a graduate of Cornell University and the Cornell Law School and is city judge of Auburn. He is past grand of Hardenburgh lodge No. 748, I. O. O. F., senior warden of Auburn Encampment No. 142, and past district deputy of Cayuga district No. 1. He has been chairman of the Grand Lodge Committee on Appeals.

At the close of the session a banquet was served.

He recently received the following note from an out-of-town customer.

"The shoes I ordered from you when in Fulton have just arrived and I like them very much; they fit fine and a great many people remark 'How Stylish!' Will want a pair of white buck ones, just the same style very soon."

Our long experience in the Shoe Business and the care we exercise in fitting is the reason we received this flattering note.

GIVING UP ADVERTISING!

GOING OUT OF BUSINESS!

The last sentence is a logical deduction of the first one; but in this case, GIVING UP ADVERTISING means CREATING BUSINESS FOR FULTON MERCHANTS AND FULTON PEOPLE. With The Evening Times, Giving up advertising means refusal to accept the voluntary business of merchants located in Oswego and Syracuse. It's a case of handing back real money to the man who wants trade from Fulton.

The Times is Handing Back Real Money Every Day to Out-of-Town Merchants

Because the agreement was made in good faith and with eyes open to the seriousness of the situation. To refuse out-of-town advertising is to do something for our town—your town. We are doing more than our share of boosting for your neighbor who may be one of Fulton's merchants—and we are glad to do that much.

WE THANK THE MERCHANTS FOR THEIR APPRECIATION OF THE BIG STEP,

And we wish them the success they so richly deserve. Here is something for you, Mr. Householder, to do—KEEP YOUR EYES UPON THE MERCHANTS WHO ARE DOING THE MOST FOR THE CITY OF FULTON.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

That was a dandy meeting we had last evening; it was a crowd of real men who were all interested in the welfare of the city of FULTON and who are willing at a moment's notice to come to the rescue.

* * *

The committee in charge of the meeting has to be congratulated; the arrangements were just fine and everybody went away satisfied.

* * *

Fulton is without a doubt a good city; that means that we have the goods to deliver. We are short on enthusiasm however and that is a bad thing, but we hope to be able to convince the people that it is necessary to cultivate enthusiasm; Fulton will then become a larger and better city.

* * *

There is a fellow walking about the city dressed like a gentleman, but he is really a combination of a snake, coward and a cur. He is a home wrecker and should be made known all over the town as such.

* * *

We had three very pleasant visits this morning from merchants in the city and talked over matters that were discussed last evening. That is the spirit and we are grateful.

* * *

There is no doubt that through the necessary education we will get there finally.

* * *

Don't forget to shake the hands of strangers; they deserve it and you will make them love your town all at once.

* * *

If a man changes his views and takes on new ideas, at least politically he is charged with being progressive. If he sticks to his old ideas and refuses to alter his viewpoint he is called conservative, a standpatter or an old fogy, depending largely upon the condition of the person's liver who is doing the calling. However, if the changed views are the man's honest opinions, why SHOULD HE COME IN FOR ADVERSE CRITICISM.

* * *

Everyone feels at liberty to critizise and abuse the policeman. He is variously accused of drunkenness, of grafting, of laziness and nearly everything else on the calendar. When the vaudeville performers spring a joke about the police in "this town" the entire audience bursts into laughter. The policeman is the joke and the butt of everyone's wit, and yet, when we are in trouble whom do we turn to first? THE POLICEMAN. When we hear a mysterious noise around the house at midnight, whom do we call—the much despised policeman. When we are at loss for the name of a street the policeman is appealed to. The mother with her babe appeals to the policeman to help her across the street and he does so kindly. In short, he does everything for everybody and his reward is abuse and complaint. If the newspaper writer is at loss for a subject he attacks the police department and the reading public applauds. No one ever thinks of the dark hours of the night when in the cold and rain the patient officer is pacing his beat, protecting the lives and property of the public. Of the times when he takes his life in his hands arresting marauders and desperate men; of the countless acts of heroism that are performed by policemen every day in the year. Remember the next time you feel like abusing the policeman, that he is HUMAN, like yourself. That he has the same hopes and aspirations that you have, and that he appreciates praise and good words just as much as you do. It will make a better policeman of him if you will do this and let him know it.

Before you open your mouth to critizise the other fellow, think it over twice and you may find out that you did worse things in your own life.

* * *

Point us out a knocker and you will find a man without any character.

* * *

Show us a booster and you will find a fellow with a broad mind and a good heart.

Fulton Now Leads In a Divided Citizenship, Says Secretary Hollenga

The three-score and ten members of the Chamber of Commerce who gathered at the library rooms last night heard a talk, the very plainness of which shook with terrific force the rut into which our city has fallen. D. S. Hollenga, secretary of the Chamber, is now dubbed "Billy Sunday the 2nd." This title has been earned by Mr. Hollenga, not alone upon last night's occasion for its the style he wears all the time. When he begins to talk about Fulton, what is and what is not, the very air scintillates.

Last night shortly after 8:30, vice president of the Chamber, Willis Morin, in the absence of president Whitaker, announced the speaker of the evening, Mr. Hollenga. Without parley he began his subject, Fulton, first, last and all the time. The opening remark called attention to the fact that the local chamber is the only known organization that publishes daily a report of its workings, and follows with a full monthly report, a summary of accomplished tasks. This, it pointed out is purely for educational purposes, "For" said Mr. Hollenga, "to educate the people as to a true knowledge of their city is the real work of a commercial organization, and. not to get factories. Every person living within this city has a right to the privileges and duties of the city whether he be clad in silken cloak or walk in rags and tags."

Illustrations were given whereby gratitude has been expressed by citizens toward a community in which they live. "But, how many of you are doing your duty toward your home and the city in which you live; have you done one thing? No, not one." said the speaker. Then he quickly asked how shall we advertise Fulton the Great unless we do something first of what avail if we were to charter a car and ride from one end of the country to the other seeking to make Fulton the mecca for manufacturers and home buliders, when we can't even pay our teachers their salary when it is due. "We cannot advertise ourselves unless we first accomplish something." said Mr. Hollenga, "we must do something for our city. We are not in politics, but how will the Democrats or Republicans ever accomplish anything unless affairs are straightened out. When we regard ourselves as one family of the city of Fulton there can b eno division of interests. There is no such thing as an Elk or Mason, Hebrew or Knights of Columbus when our city is concerned. Suppose an enemy were to attack our country how quickly you would all rally round the flag, then why in the name of all that is reasonable do you not defend your city?"

Mr. Hollenga pointed out that the Chamber of Commerce is the nucleus by which is propogated the growth and welfare of the city. The members of such an organization are responsible for the success of that body's workings, and the payingof $25 does not release a person from theo bligation of assisting, and as far as seeking personal returns, there is no sueh thing in the world of commercial organization. Then, the speaker with delightful candor, enlightened his audience with the information that they are the most divided lot of citizens it has ever beeh his experience to find. Therefore, he calmly assured them they are terribly ignorant—ignorant in a sence aside from what has been learned from books. He described his first few days in the city as having been painfully full of information given him as to as to what a bum city this is and that no one living here was worthy of anything. "If I had listened to all I heard I would instantly have packed my trunk and left the city, said Mr. Hollenga, "and yet in all my experience I never saw a greater response in any civic demonstration than that given to the municipal Christmas tree."

That there are wonderful opportunities right here at home to make Fulton one of the greatest in the world of civic activities was suggested. "These opportunities have always been here but you do not know what you have, no, and you never will until your eyes open," said the speaker. "You have not yet become acquainted with the wonderful newly organized symphony orchestra, and yet how shall we do these things without your financial and moral support.

CULTURE OF MUCK LAND TREATED BY EXPERT; PIG RAISING DISCUSSED

Standing room only was the rule in the Grange Hall this afternoon, when Prof. A. E. Wilkinson, of the State College of Agriculture, Ithaca, commenced his address on truck farming, particularly on muck lands. Prof. Wilkinson's address closed a most successful two-day session of the Farmer' Institute which brought forth hundreds of visitors from the city and towns nearby.

Much credit is due to the executive committee of the Institute, particularly to Forest Henry, of Dovere, Minn., for the manner in which the meetings were conducted and the information gathered by the visitors. Punctuality, above all, was one of the out-standing pleasantries of the sessions, as well as the "feel-at-home" atmosphere and general satisfaction enjoyed by the audiences. No question remained unanswered, the men in charge of the meeting being thoroughly acquainted with every detail and phase of farm life.

Notwithstanding the heavy downpour of rain, there was a large attendance at the morning session which commenced promptly at 10 o'clock. A long question box, in which general questions were submitted by the audience, occupied considerable time. The last question was disposed of withd ispatch, following which, Mr. Henry gave and interesting talk, in his informal style, on pig growing, mentioning the fact that a large pasture was advisable for this purpose. It

LIBRARY DOORS REMAIN CLOSED TO MUSICIANS OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Disappointment is expressed by members of the Fulton Symphony Orchestra, and the people as well, who are taking an interest in the new musical organization, that the Public Library on the banks of the Oswego river is unavailable as a place of rehearsal tomorrow afternoon. All previous rehearsals have been held in the O. U. A. M. hall, in the First National Bank building—quarters that are not all conducive to the pleasure of the performers, and for that matter, to the rendition of good music, as the accoustic properties of the hall are anything but good, but like good people, the musicians stuck to the post.

It was generally understood during the present week that last Sunday's rehearsal in the bank building would be the last of the series, and that tomorrow's event would take place in the Library basement; but the desires of the Library trustees had to be consulted, and those gentlemen willed it otherwise. While it is unknown to The Evening Times whether Mr. Carnegie stipulates that no events of am usical nature shall invade the sacred hall, on a day sacred to every decent person, the information is forthcoming that the trustees feel it incumbent upon themselves to prevent the walls of the Library building from hearing the music of the masters—the most educating, elevating, and to many souls, God-like offering that man is privileged to enjoy outside the environment of a church edifice.

Therefore, musicians of the Fulton Symphony Orchestra, you are destined to rehearse in the O. U. A. M. hall tomorrow.

THE USELESS STATE CENSUS

The official figures of the socalled state census of 1915, now for the first time published show the population of New York city as 5,047,221; of the state as 9,687,744. Both totals are absurd and impossible.

If we accept the 1905 and 1915 state censuses, wem ust believe that from 1905 to 1910, including the 1907 panic and the subsequent heavy re-emigration ,the state gained 1,046,000 in population, while from 1910 to 1915 it gained only 574,000. This is, of course, untrue.

Again, accepting the state figures, we must believe that in the years 1905 -1910, which saw the utter collapse of the building boom, New York city grew 752,000, while from 1910 to 1915 it grew only 280,000. Every builder, transportation expert and merchant knows better. The census of 1915 is less plausible than that of 1905. Under it the state fares badly, the metropolis even worse.

From a false state census we get an unfair legislative reapportionment. But we also get false death rates which libel the sanitary condition of the state and false growth rates which deny its prosperity and progress; and every citizen ought to care a great deal about that.

The federal census furnishes a fair and sufficient basis for apportionment The state census is useless and worse than useless. Why not economize by abolishing it altogether?— N. Y. World.

NIAGARA FALLS CHARTER

Much speculation is indulged in as to the effect of the decision of the Attorney General in declaring certain provisions of the Niagara Falls charter or acts of Niagara Falls officials to be unconstitutional. Those who have observed the broad scope of the so-called optional charter law are not surprised that the Attorney General should have ruled against it. Probably many more such rulings will follow the attempt to operate under it.

The Niagara Falls charter, however is as different from the Buffalo charter as night and day. It is attempted, under the Niagara Falls charter, to grant the city the right to exercise all powers of government not expressly denied, while in the Buffalo charter the city has simply the right to exercise such powers as are expressly granted. The Buffalo charter is a clear grant of definite powers, such as cities of this State have been exercising for years, the new features being in the concentration of legislative and administrative powers in one body, a direct system of election and the referdum. All of these are concededly constitutional.

The Niagara Falls charter is a skeleton charter, one of a grabbag bunch which the Legislature said cities of a certain class in the State might appropriate if they wanted that sort of mixture. Except in outline its provisions are not stated, and it is expected that the local authorities would fill in a measure with ordinances exercising such powers as were not denied them in the broad outline. If the city should get into a muddle over that sort of a charter it would not be surprising.—Buffalo Times.

BUSINESS—Particularly the most desirable business—is very much like the sport of fishing. You can catch it if you use good bait. The Evening Times offers you the correct bait.

THAT GASOLINE INQUIRY

A notable investigation has been conducted by the State Federation of Motor Clubs, into the causes which lead up to the increased price of gasoline. Notable because it failed to get right down to brass tacks, either through fear or favor of the Rockefeller family.

A few years ago gasoline went skiing right in the midst of the winter months, and the man who didn't own an automobile expressed his feelings by grinning. Gasoline was then a luxury. Trust-busters got busy and gasoline dropped in price.

In the meantime, automobiles were being made and sold at lower prices than ever before in the history of the country, and a few millions of the Common People decided to become gasoline users. Motors of all kinds and for all purposes were found to be useful on farm and in factory, with the result that nearly everybody became users of the products of the Rockefeller trust. Gasoline became pretty much of a necessity. Right at this season of the year the consumption of crude oil and gasoline is reduced to a minimum, and yet the price of these commodities continues to soar. In less than three months the price of gasoline has doubled; and this, in spite of the fact that the supply of crude oil has not decreased.

If we ask our baker friends why they have not increased the price of bread, they answer that their knowledge of economies enables them to keep down the price, in spite of the increased cost of wheat. Ask the seller of gasoline why the increase, and see what you get as an answer. He will tell you the busted trust needs the money. Ask yourself why you should help pay the big dividends to the Rockefeller family, and you say, I can't get along without the motor.

Ask the State Federation of Motor Clubs why it doesn't get at the bottom of things, and you will get the answer, We've gone as far as we can safely in gasoline economics.

Those persons who believe in the form of government under which this city has worked for years must be quite enthusiastic over the news contained in the new City Chamberlain's report to the Common Council that the different administrations have successfully carried on the work of getting finances muddled.

LIGHT ON THE MONEY DEVIL

Nothing in the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency is more interesting than the revelations of usury as it is practiced by the country banks in the national banking system, with a very fair corollary of presumption that State banking institutions similarly situated have been just as avaricious. The exhibition of sordid greed set forth seems to throw a flood of light on the money devil myth which conscienceless politicians are able to conjure up in season and out of season for the coaxing of votes in country constituencies. It may be taken for granted that the figures in the subjoined extract relate chiefly to the interest charges of the country banks:

"As of September 2, 1915, 1,022 national banks in twenty-five States were, by their sworn reports, charging an average of not less than 10 per cent. and in some cases 18 per cent. on all their loans. The sworn statements of the banks in one particular State include a list of 131 banks whose maximum rates of interest ranged from 15 to 24 per cent.; 67 banks whose maximum rate was between 25 and 60 per cent.; 22 banks which charged between 60 and 100 per cent.; and 26 banks whose maximum rates were 100 per cent. or more * * * Of the 1,022 national banks which certified under oath that they were receiving an average of 10 per cent. or more on all of their loans. 317 were in Texas * * * 300 in Oklahoma.

That is, about two-thirds of the extortioners ply their trade in the two States which have been foremost in subscribing to the political dogma of a personal money devil. Have any statesmen been more aggressive in hunting the money trust to its fabled lair than those who have hailed from Oklahoma and Texas? Before answering the question consider what the Comptroller says about three national banks in Oklahoma alone. On all loans made between September 2 and November 10 last one of these banks certified that it charged an average rate of interest of 25 per cent., another an average rate of 36 per cent. and the third an average rate of 40 per cent.

What better illustration could be afforded of the way in which the fable of the money trust grew up and how odium came to attach to Wall street as the synonym of financial oppression? Can there be any question that it has been Wall Street which the rural Shylock has urged to extenuate himself and condone his nefarious fleecing of the farmers whose borrowing necessities brought them into his clutches?

The Federal Reserve banking system had been in operation almost a year when those three Oklahoma banks were charging 25 per cent., 36 per cent. and 40 per cent. average interest on all loans made last autumn. The actual money market the country over had never been so genuinely easy in the memory of mortal man, but the usurious leeches of thep rovinces simply could not stop. Eastern bankers, New York bankers if you please, Wall Street if you like, would still serve to excuse the process of bleeding the farmer to death.

Wall Street was no more responsible before last autumn for the piracies of the country banker than it was then, but we may take it for granted that the extortionate country banker has never failed to place on Wall Street the blame for all his usuries. Doubtless that is why to this day large sections of the country are firmly persuaded that Wall street made the panic of 1907, and why agrarian politicians continue to howl about the money devil which lurks in the lower part of Manhattan Island plotting the ruin of the nation—N. Y. Sun.

LITTLE TALKS ON THRIFT

By S. W. STRAUS

President American Society for Thrift

While the saving of money is only one aspect of thrift, it is very important, especially because of its influence on character building. It also is more tangible, and affords easier means of obtaining statistics. It can be taken for granted generally that one who is thrifty with one's money, also will be thrifty with one's time.

Happily, Americans are becoming more thrifty; but the most frugal citizens in this country are those of foreign birth.

"Economy is a great revenue," said Cicero, and the postal savings deposits in this country would seem to bear him out in this statement. The Postal Savings System is designed to promote thrift and economy. Although everyone has easy access to it, it is utilized for the most part by the wage earners. Mr. Alexander M. Dockery, Third Assistant Postmaster-General, is authority for the statement that 59 per cent. of all the depositors at the close of the last fiscal year were born outside of the United States and owned 72 per cent. of all the money on deposit. The statistics show that the Russians outstrip other foreign-born depositors, with 20.7 per cent. of all the deposits to their credit. The Italians are next with 14.2 per cent. Natives of Great Britain and her colonies rank third, with 8.8 per cent. These are followed by Hungarians with 4.3 per cent; Germans with 4.1 per cent; Swedes with 2.2 per cent.; and Greeks with 1.8 per cent. There are a number of other nationalities that own 7 per cent of the deposits. New York leads all the other states with a deposit account of $21,186,196; Illinois, $5,098,146; Pennsylvania, $4,700,112; Ohio, $4,546,699; California, $3,772,053; Massachusetts, $3,188,284; Michigan, New Jersey and Washington each have more than $2,000,000, and Minnesota and Missouri have nearly that amount; Oregon, Wisconsin and Colorado have reached the $1,500,000 mark.

The popularity of the Postal Savings System and the rapidity of its growth may be seen from the fact that during the six months of the fiscal year 1911 when the system was first in operation, the deposits were $677,145. At the close of the fiscal year, June 30, 1915, the deposits were $65,684,708. At the end of the fiscal year 1911 the number of depositors was 11,918; at the end of the fiscal year 1915 the depositors numbered 525,514. It is estimated that on the 30th of November the number had increased to 560,000, with a deposit account of $73,000,000. The net profit from postal savings for the year reached $421,028.44.

It will be seen from the foregoing that thrift is on the increase in the United States; at any rate, among the foreign-born residents.

LAW WOULD PERMIT MANY AMUSEMENTS

Albany.—A bill put in by Assemblyman Serven, which proposes to permit certain organizations to conduct games and other forms of amusement for the purpose of raising funds without violating the law, will doubtless be of interest to Oswegonians. It inserts in the penal law a new section providing that nothing in that law shall apply to or forbid the conduct of games not played for money and commonly known as hoopla, fishpond, country store, paddle wheel, ball game, or other form of amusement the controlling element of which is the skill of the person engaged, or any game or form of amusement in which every player receives an equivalent for the money expended, when such game or form of amusement is conducted under the control of any volunteer fire association, any regularly incorporated fraternal, beneficial or charitable order, any charity organization society, any hospital association, or any religious organization. The above mentioned games must be conducted, however, for the exclusive purpose of raising funds for the support and purposes of the association, or for charitable relief.

"W" advertised in The Evening Times last night, asking for a house of certain size. Seven replies were mailed to this office, to say nothing about the number of phone calls. adv

Charley's Fate Hangs In Balance

WITH THE SUFFRAGISTS

Los Angeles has a woman deputy district attorney said to be the first one in the United States.

* * *

Commissioner Kingsbury has appointed three women physicians on the medical staff of Cumberland St. Hospital, Brooklyn. "So far as I know," he said in reference to the innovation," this is the first public hospital to admit women to its regular staff."

* * *

"Because women are the only persons who know how to clean house." Street Commissioner Fetherstone has decided to appoint five women inspectors. "New York is nothing more than a large private house," he announced, "and with the aid of natural housecleaners I'm sure it will get a good scrubbing in the future." The women are to be assigned to deal with the waste from factories, stores and hotels.

* * *

The New Jersey suffragists opened their new campaign at their annual convention at Elizabeth on January 21. Five hundred delegates are expected and it is regarded as the most important suffrage convention ever held in the state.

Legislative work and educative work are to be planned and special stress is laid on an open forum to discuss the question: How can we reach all the women in New Jersey?

The Congressional Union has opened headquarters in "The Little White House," where Mr. Hanna lived when he planned the campaign of 1900. Of course its leaders consider that their campaign for a federal suffrage amendment is more important than any planned by McKinley's astute advisor, and that Alice Paul is second to no mere male statesman.

From the windows of the new headquarters a perpetual watch can be maintained on their neighbor, President Wilson, just across the way.

The report of the woman suffrage bill in the Senate on January 8 was a surprise even to its friends. To have this bill brought forward so early in the session—not to have to plead, or pull, or push to get it out—is a change in the political situation.

"Remembering," said Alice Paul, Chairman of the Congressional Union, "that until two years ago the most earnest efforts of the suffragists failed to get the bill out of the committee at all, and that last Congress it was only after many and great struggles that we succeeded, this early and favorable report and Senator Thomas' excellent endorsement form a significant testimony to the great advance in the political importance of woman suffrage."

RESPONSIBILITY NOT FIXED BY CORONER

Oswego—That no one was criminally responsible for the collapse of the Pierce building in West Second street, in which two men were killed, is the decision of Coroner C. J. Vowinkel in his report of the bequest, given out today.

The coroner finds that the architects and contractor believed that the building would be safe as designed and erected, and Horace D. Pierce, the owner and builder, endeavored to provide against such a structure.

The testimony of experts is cited to show that the principal cause of the collapse was the lack of lateral bracing. The coroner concludes that if such bracing had been provided the accident would not have occurred.

The accident occurred October 22 last and the inquest occupied several days during November and December.

Our Washington Letter

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE

Washington—"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial . . . and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him;" etc.

These are the words of the Sixth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, one of the earliest amendments adopted and one of the group of amendments which were proposed in order to perfect this instrument by providing enlarged securities for the individual exposed to governmental action. To "preserve, protect, and defend" the Constitution is the chief oath which the President takes.

Last July—the fourth July, we think it was—President Wilson caused Victoriano Huerta to be arrested in Texas. He was there confined, not in a jail, but in a fort, where he has remained without the speedy trial, the exact accusation, or the producing of witnesses which the Constitution provides.

This old Indian may be of no great consequence, as matters now stand, to Woodrow Wilson or to the people of the United States but the Federal Constitution is a matter of huge importance.

Preaching "America First" and practicing "Foreigners First", is a policy that will embarrass the Democrats when they come to defend their record next Fall. In the ten months of Democratic tariff rates preceding the outbreak of the war, our imports of meat and dairy products increased to $40,545,000 as compared with $12,460,000 in the corresponding 10 months under the Republican tariff. Imports under Democratic policies were more than three times as great as under Republican policies. We gave the foreigner greater access to our markets, and yet the cost of living did not decrease. The American farmer is forgetful of some things but he will remember these figures when he makes up his mind how to vote next November. The figures are from official reports.

"You can depend upon Colorado to swing into the Republican column in 1916 by a safe and comfortable majority, said a prominent western congressman, who is in close touch with the situation. "With the proper organization and a little effective work we would have elected a Republican United States Senator there in 1914. The Republicans of Colorado are now working harmoniously together. they are enthusiastic and confident of victory and that State can be depended upon to return a substantial majority for the party at the national elections next November."

"I am just back from Indiana," said Senator John W. Korn, of that state, to a couple of his colleagues, a few days since. "I went back to spend the holidays with the home folks. While there I talked over the preparedness program with the people there and a canvass was made of the subject in three or four towns. I found sentiment overwhelmingly against the program of the president. There is no question the middle west does not warm up much on this proposition."

VILLAGE STREET IMPROVEMENT

New York State Follows Old Custom For Payments.

EXPERTS ADVOCATE CHANGE

Authorities on Taxes Are Against Making Street Improvements at the Expense of the Town and Maintain That the Cost Should Be Assessed Against Adjoining Property.

Many tax experts have recently called attention to the venerable custom of making street improvements in the villages of New York state at the general expense of the whole village.

On this important question the Real Estate Record of Westchester county has this to say:

"This custom has been freshly assailed in a small folder. Cities charge such valuable property improvements against the parties who benefit thereby, inasmuch as the market value of the premises is immediately raised more than the cost. It is asked, 'Why should the property owner have a great deal of additional value added to his land at the general expense of the community and not pay for it?' It is characterized as taxing one set of village landholders for the benefit of another set. It also increases the general tax of each village so that the taxation looks high and is high compared with cities elsewhere, hurting the sale of real estate thereby.

"The argument also is very properly advanced that since the day of the macadam road is gone and "paved" roads (with brick, asphalt or stone) are the most economical, a village ought not to incur enormous debts for such increased marketability of his land.

"The proper and right way is for the village to assess the total cost against the adjoining property, add to it the interest on a necessary bond issue to cover the same for a period of ten years and then collect one-tenth of this total cost of the improvement from the property adjoining each year. The assessment is thus easily borne by the property owner, and he gets the immediate good from the improvement making his property a great deal more valuable, and he justly bears the expense.

"The village trustees of all villages of the first and second class should be given authority to make these improvements in this way. Now their authority is too great. It enables them to improve one set of persons' property at the expense of another. In other words, the whole village pays for sidewalks and pavements in front of those of the greatest wealth on the best streets and roads and those best able to pay for it."

The following resolution was passed at the fifth annual tax conference held in Albany, Jan. 21, 1915:

Resolved, That the provision of the present law which orders that the cost of street improvement and other special improvements shall be defrayed out of the general funds of the village is antiquated, unjust and tends to retard modern progress in villages. We believe that the law should be amended so as to conform to the practice of first and second class cities in assessing all such street and special improvements upon the abutting property or proximate areas directly benefited, except that when an improvement is of direct benefit to the entire village the cost may be borne in part by the village and in part by the abutting property.

SAVING SCHOOL CHILDREN.

Sanitary Measures Now Adopted Throughout the Country.

Laws requiring sanitary conditions in public school buildings have been enforced in forty-four states of the Union, according to a bulletin on "School Sanitation," just issued by the bureau of education of the United States department of the interior. Progress in this phase of education has been made almost entirely within the last decade. That the change for the better was accomplished so rapidly was due for the most part to the readiness of each state to profit by the example of the others. A law passed in one extreme of the country today is copied within a month or a year by another state, perhaps 2,000 or 3,000 miles away.

In thirty-eight states legal provisions regarding the school site have been established. Nearly all these provisions are state wide in their application and are mandatory in character. Kansas was the first to revolt against the common drinking cup, and since that state started the crusade thirty others have followed. In the matter of cleansing and disinfecting, slightly more than one-fourth of the states have regulations which control the conditions.

The protection of one kind or another is required in thirty-six states. General or special construction designed for fire protection is dealt with in ten states. In ten the necessity for fire alarm systems and fire fighting apparatus is emphasized, and in eleven the law requires there shall be fire drills. Less than half the states, according to the bulletin, have any legal requirements on ventilation.

Public Improvements at Dallas.

The city of Dallas, Tex., has asked the federal government for an appropriation of $2,250,000 for the construction of a combined postoffice and federal building in the city and the erection of a substation at the Union Terminal station.

TO GIVE 6,000 ACRES FOR HOME FOR BOYS

Kansas Ranchman Working Out a Scheme of Philanthropy.

Topeka, Kan.—John Marriage, owner of the Eagle Canyon ranch in Mullinville, is going to turn his 6,000 acre ranch over to a home for orphan and neglected boys as a training school in farming. Marriage told of his plans in a letter to Governor Capper. He wants the governor to help.

He would make the Kiowa county ranch a big home for boys, where they may go to school, learn to farm, live right and become honest and industrious farmers.

"I have a ranch of 6,000 acres, fully equipped with machinery and stocked with pure bred cattle," the letter said. "It is excellent land, 2,400 acres devoted to farming and 3,600 acres in pasture. For years I have been operating it with hired help, but I want to get different helpers and co-operate with them on a profit sharing plan so they can have a good living and comfortable home here so long as they do right and are satisfied to remain.

"This property never is to be sold, but is to be made into a training home for orphans and neglected boys. There will be three trustees to have the general management of the property and nine co-operators to do the work and live Christian examples. We are nonsectarian, but take the whole Bible as our creed. Each co-operator will be permitted to draw cash each month for his living, also be credited Jan. 1 of each year for a share of the ranch profits. We have good schools and Sunday schools on the ranch. No one who uses liquor, tobacco, vulgarity or profanity will be tolerated."

Just how many boys or what sort of boys are to be taken and under what conditions they are to be permitted to enter the ranch school has not been worked out. Mr. Marriage is consulting other philanthropists.

Diplomacy.

A woman entered a store to buy a pair of shoes. The obliging clerk, after trying for some time to fit her, remarked:

"Madam, it seems to me that one of your feet is larger than the other!"

The woman rose quickly, glared at the clerk and left the store. She entered another store. Another obliging clerk, after trying on several pairs, remarked:

"Madam, one of your feet is smaller than the other."

"I'll take this pair," said she, smiling sweetly, and she has traded there ever since.

PEARL WHITE

SHELDON LEWIS AND PEARL WHITE

SHE OF THE BLONDE TRESSES COMES BACK TO PICTURES IN A WELL-KNOWN DRAMA, PLAYING OPPOSITE SHELDON LEWIS OF THE "ELAINE" SERIES FAME

Pearl White, she of the blonde tresses and irrepressible good spirits, has returned to picture work after a long vacation, her first in years. This should bring comfort to the many anxious fans who have wondered why of late they have not been seeing her on the screen undergoing the numerous perils and exploits that have been her lot. She has signed a contract for another year with Pathe, and is starring in a five-reel picture called "The King's Game," adapted from George B. Seitz's well-known play of the same title. It is interesting to note that in this picture she plays opposite Sheldon Lewis, her co-worker in "The Exploits of Elaine," and that Arnold Daly, the hero of that serial, is producing the picture.

Miss White today is undoubtedly one of the three best known motion picture stars in the business, and commands a high salary. This is the result of her work in the various very popular serials beginning with "The Perils of Pauline," now a film classic, and extending through the three "Elaine" serials. It is promised that she will star in another Pathe serial before long, as well as in various feature photoplays.

TEACHERS AND PUPILS COMMENDED FOR RESULTS IN PRELIMINARY EXAMS

I feel that the excellent work done during the past term by the 7th and 8th grade teachers in our schools and the results attained in the Regents' examinations just closed, in reading, writing, geography, spelling, arithmetic, Elem. English and U. S. History—the preliminary subjects—should not be passed by without public recognition and a word of commendation.

Sixty-one pupils instead of 37, as stated in yesterday's Evening Times, earned promotion to the high school—an unusually large number for mid-year. It is the quality of the work, however, as shown by the results in these State examinations that is particularly commendable. There were very few failures in any subject.

Non-residents who came into our schools to try these examinations are not counted in the following record.

In reading, 61 passed; 60 were 90 per cent. or over. Writing, 61 passed, 37 were 90 per cent or over. Geography, 75 passed, 57 were 90 per cent or over. Spelling, 81 passed, 49 were 90 per cent or over. Elem. English, 56 passed, 35 were 90 per cent or over. Arithmetic, 50 passed, 30 were 90 per cent or over. U. S. History, 56 passed, 20 were 90 per cent or over. Over 50 per cent. of the above were honor papers.

The following had 100 per cent papers:

Writing—Evangeline Hopkins, 4th st. school.

Geography—Guy Appleton, Paul Hunter, and Donald O'Halloran of State st. school; Cecil Battles, William Cook, Ruth McEwen and Edward Summerville of Phillips st. school; Glenn Whitcomb, Mary Pealo, Harlow Cole, and Raymond McKenna of Oak st. school; George Childs, David Hubbard, and Glenn Quirk of Erie st. school.

Spelling—Annabell Spencer of 4th st. school; Percy Andrews, Charles Culkin, Anna Hartnett and Gladys Loveland of Phillips st. school; Harry McCarthy of State st. school.

Elem. English—Ameta Boyd of Phillips st. school; Vincent Edgarton, Angie McNally and Muriel Morgan of State st. school.

Arithmetic—Joseph Conners, Frances Payne of 4th st. school; Vincent Edgarton, Vernon Kimball, Walter Walts of State st. school; Leslie Dewey of Phillips st. school.

U. S. History—Katherine McKenna of Erie st. school.

The above results in final examinations for admission to the high school are exceptionally good and reflect great credit on teachers and pupils. I doubt if any school in the State can produce a better record in these preliminary subjects.

SOLVAY HIGH SNOWED UNDER

Victory Result of Improved, Careful Work—Too Many Fouls Scored by Local Team.

A mere handful of high school students saw their basketball team score a splendid victory over the Solvay High school five on the City Hall Court last night. To the local enthusiast, the game was by far the most interesting of the season, the entire quintet of the locals showing up in splendid style. Epecially noticable was the improvement in the passwork of Coach Merrill's men, the careless handling of the ball prevalent during the fore part of the season being entirely lacking in this contest. The final score was 47-29.

The victory for the locals was clean cut, leaving no question of the superiority of the Fulton team. Only once during the entire period were the visitors in the running and that for the brief space of a minute. J. Tinsdall, the star of the visiting five, was the first man on the floor to locate the basket but Martin, who made a reputation for himself in foul shooting, scored two fouls in succession and later a basket which place the local boys in the lead. During the second half of the game the visitors took a spurt and came within three points of tieing the score, but the home team awakened to the situation and from then on scored a succession of baskets. Wallace the tall center of Fulton High scored ten baskets from the field.

Robert Crockett officiated as referee in place of Morin who was unable to attend the game and his decisions were of a highly satisfactory nature. The result was the game was kept clean and fast. It became necessary to substitute LaPoint in place of Frawley, who was disqualified owing to the accumulation of ersonal fouls.

The lineup of the teams was as follows:

| Fulton | | Solvay High |
|---|---|---|
| D. O'Brien | Right Forward | W. Tindall |
| H. Martin | Left Forward | McCollum |
| Wallame | Center | J. Tindall |
| Johnson | Right Guard | Dary |
| Frawley | Left Guard | Martineau |

Substitutions—La Point for Frawley. Baskets from field—W. Tindall (2), J. Tindall (4), O'Brien (2), Martin (3), Wallace (10), Frawley, LaPoint and Johson. Goals from foul line—J. Tindall (8), Martin (11).

Referee, Crockett. Timekeeper—Webb. Scorer—Reynolds. Time of halves—20 minutes.

K. OF C. HAS EYES ON HOME

Negotiations are in progress by the Knights of Columbus to purchase the property at 173 South 1st st., for many years occupied by the Hon. Willard Johnson as a home, and more recently, by Mr. Thomas Hunter.

It would seem that this property would be ideal for the K. of C. for club and lodge purposes, being easily accessible to members of both the East and West Side. The construction and arrangement are such that with little change fine parlors and other rooms necessary to a club house may be had on the first floor. The removal of partitions of part of the second floor, a spacious lodge room with high ceiling and several smaller rooms for various purposes may be secured.

The details of the transaction are being looked after by Whitaker & Bogardus, Inc., representing both the Trust & Deposit Co. of Onondaga, and the representatives of the K. of C.

It is very confindently expected that the negotiations will be brought to a successful termination.

UPLIFTERS ENTERTAINED AT A MOCK WEDDING

It remained for Miss Ruth Smith, of 604 East Broadway, to provide a novel entertainment for the Uplifters of State street church, last night. It was in the form of a mock wedding, participated in by young women exclusively, the minister being Mrs. C. Wilson, and the bride and groom, the Misses Hettie Stanton and Leah Kline respectively. Miss Smith was maid of honor, and the "best man" character was looked after by Miss Lila Blakeslee. Miss Olie Alger was bridesmaid, and Miss Trixy Dix acquitted herself as a dignified matron or honor. Miss Edith Robinson and Miss Marion Barless and Miss Grace Chesbro were charming as flower girl and ribbon bearers respectively. Miss Gertrude Chubb and Miss Leah McGibbons, ring bearers; Miss Marion Haskins, mother of the bride; and Miss Margery Haskins, the groom's mother, were the remaining members of the cast who played leading roles. The ushers and the page were: the Misses Mildred Kellogg, Jane Brown, and Mrs. N. H. Brown; respectively.

During the evening's fun a miscellaneous shower was given in honor of Miss Hettie Stanton, and many useful presents were received by the young lady.

Refreshments were served by "Jasper" and "Dinah" Hall, caterer and cateress.

FAMILY NEARLY OVERCOME BY INHALING FUMES

D. C. Read, grocer of West 2nd st., with his wife and child had a narrow escape from asphyxiation by gas yesterday morning which escaped into their rooms from a defective furnace connection. Mrs. Reed inhaled so much of the fumes as to necesitate the attendance of a physician during the entire day.

Mr. Reed's work makes it necessary for him to arise about 5 a. m., and as he did so his knees gave way and he fell upon the floor. Kenneth, 7, was also unable to stand upon his feet. Mr. Reed, in a semi-conscious state, was unable to detect the odor of gas, but he managed to reach the telephone, summoning his father-in-law, Captain Norton, of the police department. The Captain and Mrs. Norton responded to the call immediately, and upon entering the house sized up the situation at a glance and called Dr. Schlappi.

MISS ANNIE MILLS LEAVES FOR SCOTLAND MONDAY

Miss Annie Mills, who has been spending a few months with her many friends here, will leave America on Monday for Scotland, but prior to her departure she will be the recipient of social honors, the first of which a luncheon to be served this afternoon by Mrs. Horace N. Gilbert, of Academy st. Ten of Mrs. Gilbert's intimate women friends will grace the occasion, a pleasing time being in store for all of them.

Miss Mills, while here, has spent most of her time as the guest of Mrs. R. C. Carr, but before returning to America, she lived in Austria, leaving that troubled country just after the outbreak of the war.

TWENTY-FIFTH WEDDING ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATED

The home of Mr. and Mrs. F. C. Wolever, 317 South 4th st., was the scene of a happy event, last night, when a few chosen friends and relatives of the interested persons met there to aid in celebrating the twenty-fifth wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Bradford, of Cortland. Mrs. Bradford is one of Mrs. Wolever's sisters, and everything which would add to the enjoyment of the event was accomplished by Mrs. Wolever. Music and cards were indulged in, and numerous presents were bestowed upon the honored ones. One of the gifts was a spoon one hundred years old, which belonged to Mrs. Bradford's grandfather, Mr. V. E. Sears.

A lot of hearty amusement was afforded by Mr. C. W. Hobbie, who reunited the Bradfords in the holy bonds of matrimony. A dainty luncheon, in the diningroom, decorated in pink and white, was served at the conclusion of the ceremony.

The Birthday Club, of which the Bradfords have been members for six years, presented them with a handsome candelabra.

The guests who came from a distance were: Mr. and Mrs. James Hillick, of Cortland; Mrs. F. L. Porter, of Syracuse; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Wolever of Oswego.

TWILIGHT AIDS THE CHICKENS

Seneca Falls—After months of experimenting, Gail Hamilton, a draftsman employed by the Goulds Manufacturing Company of Seneca Falls, has become convinced that the use of "twilight sleep" to induce hens to keep up the usual production of eggs during the dark winter months is a decided success. Through the use of the system, Mr. Hamilton has been able to keep thep roductiaon of eggs at seventy per cent.

Mr. Hamilton owns fifty white leghorn hens. During thew inter the egg production drops to thirty per cent. or fifteen eggs a day. After a careful study of the problem he decided that hens stopped eating about 4:30 and went to roost fon the night. Hens will eat as long as they can see, he figured, and during the winter the hours are too short for taking in sufficient nourishment for a satisfactory egg production. He installed a fifty-watt tungsten electric light which is turned on shortly after 4 o'clock and hens are kept busy until 8 o'clock.

But hens like twilight sleep, and a brilliantly lighted henhouse that is suddenly plunged into total darkness at 8 o'clock would not provide twilight sleep but would leave hens to grope their way to the roost in the dark or sit upon the cold floor of the coop during the night. Like human beings, hens must have rest to maintain their efficiency thef ollowing day and sitting all night on a cold floor does not put the hen in the best of spirits the next day.

To overcome this an artificial dimmer was installed. The lights are not extinguished suddenly. Instead, the dimmer starts working at 8 o'clock and the electricity is gradually cut off until artificial twilight arrives. The hens take the warning and seek their roosts.

Mr. Hamilton states that the egg production varies but little under the "twilight system," maintaining practically seventy per cent. The high record is forty-two eggs in one day from fifty hens. The electricity costs $1 per month, while the returns are about fifteen times that amount.

ONE NIGHT AWAY FROM HOME ENOUGH

Clyde McEwen, 9, a charter member of the organization of boys— for such it is—who, without the knowledge of folks at home depart for parts unknown, is back under the parental roof today after surveying a considerable portion of the New York Central lines.

Clyde made his departure last night on the 6:10 train south and alighting at Woodard took a position behind the tender of a train north. Observing eyes at Richland detected the boy's presence and he was placed in charge of the authorities in that plece.

The youngster, after he recovers from his spasm of tears, occasioned by a severe lecture from Chief of Police Dyer, will tell his comrades of occupying a hotel room over night with a bell boy at his service, for which his parents will pay. $2.50.

Culture of Muck Land Treated by Expert

is the means of cheaper production, he stated. Pig growing seemed to interest the gathering to the extent that volleys of questions were fired at the speaker. all of which furnished enlightenment to the entire audience on obstacles which they have met within raising swine.

E. W. Catchpole, of North Rose, Wayne County, talked on fruit until the noon hour, when the meeting was adjourned. Before the afternoon session convened. Mr. Henry gave a demonstration talk to a large number of men at the site of the old canal bridge on the essential points in a good horse. Living speciments were on hand for demonstration purposes.

Promptly at 1:30, with practically every seat taken, a full question box had to be disposed of before Mr. Henry gave a short talk on cheap feeds for the dairy. Mr. Wilkinson's subject of truck farming proved to be one of the most interesting topics of the entire two day session.

CHICKEN RAISING AND EDUCATION PUT BEFORE FARMERS' INSTITUTE

"Preparedness" educational problems and the various activities of the people of the United States, particularly the residents of New York state, were topics included in the address of E. F. McDonald, of Massena, at the session of the Farmers' Institute, held last night in the Grange Hall.

More than a hundred people, half of them women listened to the speakers and fired volleys of questions at Mr. Forest Henry, who was prepared to answer the inquiries. Mrs. Monroe opened a question box on farm poultry, and Mr. McDonald discussed school problems.

In opening her address Mrs. Monroe drew a laugh from her audience when she stated that when a person fails in every other venture, it is regarded as certain that success will follow poultry raising. "Successful poultry raising is difficult," she continued, "and it is a hard business problem to make the occupation one worth while working at."

Too Many Breeds

"White eggs in my town bring ten cents a dozen more that the brown variety, which of course is unusual for the average market," she stated. Mrs. Monroe suggests that a farmer select one certain breed of hens. He will eventually earn the most money owing to the uniformity in the yield of eggs, size and color considered. A farmer with different breeds of hens is naturally supplied with eggs of many sizes, which have to be assorted for the market. Mixed breeds of hens produce different classes of eggs which, considering the fact that they are to be used for hatching purposes, will result in the hatching of some hens which are good layers and others which are not. By standardizing the breed, the farmer is prepared to engage in the poultry business in a profitable way."

"There are two ways to get eggs in winter. One is by feeding and the other breeding," said Mrs. Monroe. She added that a hen is most profitable when she lays eggs throughout the year. A hen that does not lay in summer is a loss. The best hens are those which lay through the summer, and particularly towards the latter part of the summer.

For hatching purposes, eggs should be kept in an even temperature—one not variable. Variety of temperature will have effect of chilling the germs in the eggs, thereby destroying their vitality. Draughts should be avoided. A damp cellar is a suitable place for storage. One hundred hens should be kept in a flock according to Mrs. Monroe, and thep roblem of feeding a flock of this size should be given strict attention.

A good mash for hens is a mixture of grains. Construct all equipment in a hen house oh stilts—or otherwise in order that the fowl may have adequate floor space.

Proper Food Demanded

"Farmers in a great many cases wonder why certain of their hens do not lay," the speaker stated, "and it is probably due to the one fact that the hens have not been given the proper amount of food. A hen needs just so much food for the maintenance of her own body and a small surplus for laying eggs. To have this surplus in the correct proportion is the solution of the whole problem. A hen should have all she wants to eat at least once a day.

Hens should be permitted to go out in winter, Mrs. Monroe continued, "and statistics show that hens which are permitted to do so average 17 more eggs a year, producing fertile eggs earlier in the season. It makes a stronger hen, a better layer, with more vitality. A good hen should bring a profit to the owner at the end of the year of from $1.25 to $1.50.

The last speaker of the evening Mr. McDonald, illustrated his talk with several humorous stories, stating that the State is today confronted with great education problems. "Education is purely a State institution," he said, adding that, "the Federal Government has no jurisdiction over educational matters. The system of education is also very elastic through out New York City. It is variable in each community.

Practical Work Needed

"Education is developing fast into practical lines," he continued, "and it should do so." One-half of the children attending school in this State leaves school before the termination of the sixth year. Why is this, he asked." "Simply because the boy sees he is not getting in the school course what he wants for life, so he turns to something else. The result is, he lands in a factory at $1.25 a day. Here the speaker cited the case of a Jefferson county school teacher whose boys could not handle the problems of biology, latin, etc., and would not, because they believed there was nothing to be gained by a knowledge of these subjects. The result was, employment in the nearby paper mills.

The commercial resources of New York State were outlined by the speaker, who stated that this State had four times the commercial interests of Japan. He gave statistics on the percentage of people engaged in professional work, manufacturing, etc. In the first-named division there is a mere five per cent. which the speaker stated would be increased by changes in the educational system of the State.

Mr. McDonald extended a compliment to Superintendent of Schools Warren S. Gardner for the home project work which the pupils were interested in, engaging in various pursuits connected with their home environment, viz: the raising of produce by the boys and sewing and cooking by the girl students. Miss Nancy Cook, was complimented by the speaker.

The absurdity of some arithmetical problems found in school text books received comment. "This is the most important problem of the day—What should the child be taught? Within a year of two, according to the speaker, algebra and latin will be made elective subjects, while physics and chemistry will be combined into one subject.

A proposal has been made to have the town the unit instead of the district, in the State Educational system, the town school board to consist of seven members with the same authority as the school trustees now have—to hire teachers, close schools, enforce educational laws, unite and form high schools, etc. It would remove the hardship of securing trustees, as many men will not serve in that capacity, therefore the necessity of getting men to take office who have moved into th district recently.

Mr. McDanold at this point discussed in an informal manner proposed annullment of district schools. Speakingfi of the law recently passed on the teachers' pension fund, he advised that retirement from twenty-five years' service as a teacher does not necessarily mean being made a pensioner, that the question should be decided by the pension board.

Mr. McDonald's concluding remarks were on the care of the children within the school room. Proper drinking water kept in a covered jar, suitable lighting within the school room, medical examination and vaccination and ventillation were reviewed.

The desks in the school room should not be located so that a student faces a window. The light should come from the rear and from the left. The vaccination law does not make vaccination compulsory, only in a small pox section. Ventilation of the child's sleeping room was also illustrated.

FULTON'S CITIZENSHIP DIVIDED, SAYS SECRETARY

You must wake up and look around! Do you people of Fulton know that you are forcing your merchants to get six different kinds of bread from out of town, and you have bakers at home who need youir support. However, if we decide to cut one another we may do it, but what will happen, we will close up shop sooner or later."

In continuing his illuminating process Mr. Hollenga stated he knew of one man who of necessity made three trips to Syracuse where he was having a suit tailored; then when he had the suit he made the fourth trip to get it altered, and lo, the man even then didn't see he was getting 'soaked'. Also, to cap the climax he knows of a man who actually sends his suits to Syracuse to get them pressed! In a gale of laughter everybody looked at everybody else, but in spite of the fact that a couple of men uneasily shifted their positions while their faces grew red, Mr. Hollenga, clamly assured the company the guilty gentleman was not present.

Following this Mr. Hollenga pointed out the necessity of making new comers in our city feel at home. He said he knew of one city to which a merchant moved and opened up a store. He had scarcely become settled when one evening the door bell rang and the merchant found upon his doorstep three members of the Chamber of Commerce. Being bidden they entered and the keynote of their conversation was of the good things about the town. Upon departing the men offered their services to the newcomers, and left in their wake a wholesome opinion as to the worth of the town. In contrast to this incident was told the story of the happening of a newcomer in Fulton. The man came, he opened shop, he rented a home and no one even looked his way. No one welcomed him to the city and when he went out to get goods to sell over his counter, "You soaked him good and plenty," was the news imparted.

Continuing further, this very plain-spoken secretary gave the information that there are men in Fulton who wouldn't attend a meeting as that of last night and sit along side of another for fear he might find out some scheme or plan whereby that other might get a dollar out of his till. "Education is the only cure for such a man, said Mr. Hollenga, "and you manufacturers and merchants must work together. When you become interested in your town you will get together, and that interest we shall have for we are going to force it. There are all sorts of places in this city for manufacturing sites but first of all we must arrange ourselves: Factories do not grow on bushes like roses. It may interest you to know a committee is at present working for the establishing of a factory in this city. It looks promising but if we do not get it I'll bet you you will say 'Well, they didn't get it —, they-did-not-get-it—h m m! And if we fail to get it, why?—Because you have never educated yourselves to fight for yourselves."

The advertising by local merchants in Syracuse newspapers was distinctly "made fun of" by the speaker. It was noted he did not once use the term "business men" in speaking of such advertisers. Illustrations of the absurdity of such a policy for "business getting" were made suffi;ciently clear for a child to understand.

The public market, creative interest by movies of Fulton, the information that the Chamber is active relative to retaining in Fulton the Knitting plant were topics touched upon by the secretary as he brought to a close his talk with the words— Certain things can be done in Fulton if—you please.

Messrs. Bristol, Paddock, Redhead, Flanders and Deuel talked briefly upon topics of local interest, after which adjournment was taken and lunch was served under the direction of Caterer Hall.

MERELY A QUESTION OF ADVERTISING

---NOTHING ELSE TO IT!

CIVIC PROBLEMS.

One might with good reason question wherein a city profits through its improvements if they injuriously react upon the home life of its people. In our American communities there is an enlarging group of citizens who are finding their environment growing adverse, their homes growing smaller and the free space surrounding such where their children may play under parental oversight more restricted. Our cities are themselves growing larger. The census of 1910 shows an urban increase in population of 34.8 per cent as contrasted with a rural increase of only 11.2 per cent. In keeping with this growth there has gone an increase in urban wealth with enlarged municipal appropriations for public improvements that steadily force up taxes, both because of the cost of such improvements and their reaction on social welfare. Various reasons have been assigned for this. Undoubtedly there should be a greater centralization of authority in the management of municipal affairs which would bring about a better co-ordination of the subdepartments and produce greater administrative efficiency. — Carl Aronovici in Town Development Magazine.

CITY AND RURAL MARKETS.

Advantages of Co-operation In Marketing Farm Products.

The advantages of co-operation in the marketing of farm products are emphasized in the annual report of the office of markets and rural organization of the department of agriculture. which has just been published. "The conclusion seems warranted," says the report, "that in communities where co-operation is practically applied to the farmer's business the results obtained are far more satisfactory than those secured by individual methods." It is estimated that farmers' co-operative marketing and purchasing organizations will transact this year a total business amounting to more than $1,400,000,000. Agricultural co-operation in the United States is therefore far more prevalent than is generally believed, but it is not yet upon a sufficiently strong business basis. For this reason the office of markets has studied the various methods employed by these associations and has worked to devise means by which these methods can be perfected. The studies also have included the prevailing methods of marketing perishable products—grain, cotton, cotton seed, live stock and animal products.

Studies have also been made of city markets in order to secure in this way information which may open up outlets for farm products. In this connection the report calls attention to the experimental work in distributing timely market information concerning perishable products. An effort has been made to keep producers informed of arrivals and conditions in the large markets and, on the other hand, to keep dealers informed of shipments from the important producing sections. Strawberries, peaches, tomatoes and cantaloupes were the crops covered in this way during the past season. There is evidence, says the report, that as a result of this service distribution has been improved, glutted markets have been prevented to some extent, total shipments from several districts have been greater than they would have been otherwise, and large bodies of growers have received accurate and disinterested information concerning prevailing conditions in competing producing areas and in distant markets. Several important newspapers have co-operated in this work by publishing these reports.

The work of encouraging the proper preparation of products for market has been continued. The ultimate aim of this campaign of education is the national standardization of market grades and also packages or containers.

Investigation into the problems of transportation and storage has been continued with a view to determining the causes of the great loss of foodstuffs between the producer and the consumer. Experimental shipments by parcel post and express were made during the year with many kinds of fruits and berries, lettuce, milk, butter, eggs, sirup and vegetables. In nearly every case it was found that the success of the shipment depended upon the judgment used in selecting the quality of the product and the type of container.

Another important division of the work of the office for the past year is its rural organization investigations and in particular its study of the problems of rural credit and insurance.

Young Men For Civic Work.

For the purpose of utilizing the energy and enthusiasm of the young men of New Orleans, La., in behalf of the development of the community a young men's branch of the New Orleans Association of Commerce has been organized. The efforts of this branch of the association will be directed to the training of men at an earlier period than has formerly been the practice in the work of co-operating for the civic and commercial advancement of the community. Operating under a plan which has been worked out with great care, it is anticipated that by this means many trained leaders and workers will be produced within the association.

A SAVING OF TIME.

The Judge, You See, Simply Had to Get Away From Court In a Hurry.

The following judicial incident, grimly humorous, is said to have taken place many years ago in Ireland at a time when rioting and disorder were getting to a serious point.

There was a Galway judge who was very fond of fox hunting and would never miss a meet if he could possibly be there. His clerk had a similar taste and never lost a chance of witnessing a hunt. One morning the clerk whispered to the judge, "Yer honor, there's a meet today at Ballykilmulligan, and they've a fine dog fox."

"How many prisoners have we?" asked the judge.

"Twenty, for rioting and breach of peace, your honor."

"Tim," said the judge, "do you think you can get the first fellow to plead guilty without a trial—me to let him off with a week in jail?"

"The easiest thing in the world!" answered the faithful clerk.

"Make haste, then, and bring the whole gang. And, I say, Tim, tell Jerry to saddle the mare meanwhile!"

The twenty prisoners were brought into court—nineteen of them prepared to fight counsel and jury to the bitter end. The twentieth had been interviewed by the clerk. "Guilty or not guilty of the crimes charged?" demanded the judge, with a propitious smile. "Guilty, yer honor," said the crafty prisoner. "Well," said the judge, glancing benevolently about the room, "I will let you off with a week's imprisonment."

The man thanked the judge and stepped down. There was a great sensation among the other defendants. None of them expected to get off with less than five years in prison. Here was a good chance to profit by the judge's pleasant mood.

"Do you all plead guilty?" demanded the judge eagerly. "We do!" shouted the enthusiastic nineteen in chorus.

"Five years' penal servitude each!" exclaimed the judge. "Jerry, is the mare saddled yet?"—Exchange.

Wonder if She Could Talk?

I went into a restaurant the other day (said a very observing man) and saw a friend of mine seated at a table with a lady. She had false teeth, false hair, a glass eye and a wooden pedal. My friend says, "Let me introduce you to my wife."

I took him aside and in an undertone said: "How could you ever marry such a looking woman? I see she has false hair, false teeth and a glass eye."

He says, "Talk out, my boy; she's deaf too."—Exchange.

Testing His Scales.

"Thank heaven, James has quit calling me Baby!" said the woman who weighs well over 200 pounds. "A strange butcher shamed him out of it. It was done unconsciously too. That is why it was so effective. Since I began to diet I have been weighed often. The other day when James was buying liver for the cat he remarked that he wished there were reliable scales in the neighborhood to weigh Baby on.

HE WAS READY FOR US.

"Said the butcher, 'Bring her down here.'

"'Thanks,' said James; 'I will.'

"James told me the butcher was expecting us, so we went. He was ready for us. He had rigged up a nice little shawl arrangement suspended from the hanging scales to put baby in, and then he was introduced to—me. James hasn't called me Baby since."—New York Times.

Hoaxing the Latinists.

Perhaps one of the best of the numerous class of sham Latin inscriptions was that which appeared some time ago in a Dublin paper. It was in antique "Latin," as follows:

I sabylle haeres ago, fortibus es in aro. Nobile Thisbe forte trux, se vaticinempes an dux.

This purported to have been found near the site of a church dedicated to "the saint known to the old chroniclers as Uncatus Ambulanus."

The "Latin" inscription was in reality an absurd rime:

I say, Billy, here's a go!
Forty buses in a row.
No, Billy; this be forty trucks.
See vot is in 'em—peas and ducks.

A Queer Case Of Suicide

By WILLIAM BLAKEMAN

I am a Russian with a name so unpronounceable by English speaking people that I call myself Hawks. My real reason for assuming a name was that I was implicated in an assassination scheme, was given away by a fellow conspirator and fled the country before the police could lay a hand on me. Being informed that the Russian government had put the American police on my track with a trumped up charge of embezzlement in order to secure my extradition, I took another name. I was very poor, and, not daring to remain in one place long enough to gain a foothold by work, I adopted the profession of tramp.

During my wanderings I fell in with a man who much resembled me. He was an Austrian Pole who had come to this country to better his condition, but had not succeeded. He had become a tramp, like myself, in order to gain a living. We became very good friends and tramped together—that is, we slept in the same places at night. Shimsky—that is the name he gave me—finally fell sick. We were camping in a wood at the time, and, since he objected to going to a hospital, I made him as comfortable as I could, provided for his necessities and nursed him. Had I realized how ill he was I would not have consented to this.

One night Shimsky grew suddenly worse and died in the early morning. While looking on the body, considering what action I should take, noticing his resemblance to myself, a plan for throwing the police off my track occurred to me. I ran a knife into his heart, spattered blood from my own arm on his shirt and pinned to his clothing a paper on which I had written the following:

This is the body of Paul Ximanowsky, alias James Hawks, a Russian, who was implicated in the Ivanovitch assassination in Russia. He has been killed by one of his own countrymen, a kinsman of the man he assassinated.

I left the body unburied and set off tramping. A week later I was arrested while passing through a small town and charged with murder. I had been seen in company with Shimsky, and the local police had been put on my track.

Here was a dilemma. I was wanted by one set of police to be sent to Russia to be tried for the murder of Ivanovitch and by another for the murder of myself. As Ximanowsky I was dead and could not be killed any more; as Shimsky I would be tried for my own murder, and there was every chance that I would be convicted. If so I would be punished for killing a dead man.

However, thus far my ruse in throwing the police off the track of the man wanted in Russia was successful. The very prominence that the case was given in the newspapers helped this feature, for those hired by the Russian government to arrest me seeing an account of how I had been murdered abandoned the pursuit, sending an account of my demise to Russia. If I could get off from the charges of having murdered myself my troubles would be ended. But how could I hope to do this without telling the whole story and being taken to Russia as myself?

Not being able to employ an attorney to defend me the court assigned me one. I explained the situation to him. He believed my story and at once took a deep interest in my case, remarking, "This is the prettiest problem I have met since I became a lawyer." Then he left me to think out a plan to clear me without giving away my true character.

There was one point in my favor—those who had been pursuing me for the Russian government had been eliminated so long as I was not known to be their quarry. On this fact my counsel banked. The day after he left me a man came to my cell and asked me to write a statement as to where I was at the time my murder was committed. I did so, claiming to have left the murdered man two days before he died, but that I couldn't exactly remember where I had been for the next few days.

My trial came off soon after this. I did not see my counsel in the meanwhile and wondered why he had not visited me, fearing that he had failed to hit upon a plan for my defense. When I was led into court, however, he smiled at me, as much as to say, "Don't worry; it will come out all right." He called the man to whom I had given the statement and asked him if he had seen me write it. Then he called a woman who had befriended me and to whom I had sent a trifling gift with a letter. This letter I had signed James Hawks.

"Your honor," said my counsel, "my client has been accused of killing himself, which is impossible. I ask for a quashing of the indictment and that he be set at liberty."

The judge took the matter under advisement, but my counsel, who feared that delay would put the Russian government's police on my track, argued with him so strongly that he concluded to set me free. The lawyer at once came to me with the good news.

"You get!" he said, "and lose yourself next time some other way."

I doubt if the Russian sleuths ever heard of the denouement, for I never learned afterward that they resumed their efforts to find me.

After this affair I settled in one place under another name, married and prospered.

Woman's World

Contralto of New York's Oratorio Society Is an Ardent Suffragist.

MISS HENRIETTE WAKEFIELD.

Miss Henriette Wakefield, who sang the contralto solos in the Christmas production of the "Messiah" by the Oratorio society of New York recently, is a votes for women enthusiast. She won seven votes for the woman suffrage amendment on Nov. 2 from the male members of her household. Five brothers, her father and her husband succumbed to suffrage appeals of Miss Wakefield.

But Miss Wakefield didn't stop with seven votes. Her deep contralto arguments were used on taxi drivers and cabbies and elevator men.

"The ballot is bound to better the condition of every professional woman," she says. "When women vote they may be able to regulate by law some of the conditions which are now left too much to haphazard and to chance. I think we may make American ideals prevail in music as we will in other things." She believes in American music and American musicians and is proud of having gained her education and won her spurs entirely in this country.

Her first opera successes sound like the luck of the traditional story book girl. When she was only a little over eighteen years old she went to Conried to see if she would "do" for grand opera. He told her enthusiastically that she had a beautiful voice and would make a musical success, but she was too young and must go home and wait. Within a few days afterward, however, she got a hurry call to take the role of Mlle. Dangerville in the opera of "Adrienne Lecouvreur" just four days before the season opened. Some delay kept her from obtaining her score until Saturday noon, and her part had to be ready by Monday night. She was to sing with Caruso, Cavalieri and Scotti, who also arrived at the last minute, almost breathless, off the steamer to rehearse their parts. Since then Miss Wakefield has sung in nearly all the best known operas of the Metropolitan company.

Graham Bread.

Materials: Two and three-quarter cupfuls of graham flour, one teaspoonful of salt, one-quarter cupful of sugar, one teaspoonful of soda, one-third cupful of English walnut meats, cut up; one-half cupful of molasses, one cupful of milk, one egg, one tablespoonful of shortening.

Utensils: Mixing bowl, spoon, measuring cup, eggbeater, knife, buttered bread tin.

Directions: Mix dry ingredients, beat egg and add flour, add molasses, milk and shortening, stir thoroughly, put into tin and bake forty to forty-five minutes in slow oven. If sour milk is not at hand use sweet milk, one teaspoonful of baking powder and cut the amount of soda to one-half teaspoonful. Bacon fat is a good shortening.

White Mountain Cake, Orange Filling.

One-half cupful butter, two cupfuls sugar, one cupful milk, three eggs (whites), three and one-half cupfuls flour and two rounded teaspoonfuls baking powder. Cream butter and sugar together until light. Add the milk very slowly and keep beating all the time. Sift flour and baking powder together, add half, then the whites of eggs which have been beaten light and the rest of flour. Bake in two jelly tins on paper in moderate hot oven twenty to twenty-five minutes.

Soft Gingerbread

One teaspoonful of molasses, one-third cupful of butter, one and three-quarter teaspoonfuls of soda, one-half cupful of sour milk, one egg, two cupfuls of flour, two teaspoonfuls of ginger and one-half teaspoonful of salt. Put butter and molasses in saucepan and cook until boiling point is reached; remove from fire, add soda and beat vigorously. Then add milk, egg, well beaten, and remaining ingredients, mixed and sifted. Bake about twenty-five minutes in a hot oven.

CARE OF CLOTHES.

Slip Your Garments on a Hanger Instead of a Chair Back.

Never leave your suits or dresses lying on a chair or on the bed rail, but put a hanger in them the minute you take them off. It is simply a matter of habit, and it is just as easy to learn to slip a hanger into your coat and put it in the closet at once as it is to throw it on a chair, to hang up later. Creases and wrinkles wear out the cloth, and the only way to keep your clothes free of wrinkles is to hang them up when you remove them.

Shoes, too, retain their shape much longer if trees are kept in them. You can always tell the shoes which are neglected by their wrinkled, shapeless look. It is a matter of a moment or two to slip shoe trees into your boots when you take them off, and this will prevent the leather from relaxing. Footgear which has no acquaintance with shoe trees usually splits and cracks just twice as quickly as the well cared for variety. If you will rub a little vaseline into your shoes when new it will prevent the damp and wet from splitting the leather.

When your tailored skirts become wet from the rain do not let them stay wrinkled, but press them with a hot iron before they become dry. By the way, it is a real economy to invest in a good, durable raincoat, because it will protect your suits and frocks to a great extent and will actually save you money.

Wicker Hampers.

A wicker hamper is perhaps the ideal laundry container. But it must be kept clean. One enameled white looks so clean that it is hard to remember that it may harbor impurities, even germs. It must be washed in hot water occasionally and dried in the sunshine, and then sometimes it can be further refreshed with a clean coat of enamel.

Perhaps the ideal method is to have a sunny, dry laundry and there to gather the soiled clothes. Everything damp, like bath towels, should be spread out on a washable wooden or metal rack and dried each day, then placed in a basket or hamper. The clothes should not be piled together pellmell. Table linen should be kept by itself in a separate hamper. Household linen can be kept in another and clothes in a third.

Mock Bisque Soup.

Cook a can of tomatoes with a tablespoonful of sugar and an onion cut in slices half an hour. Add half a teaspoonful of soda and pass through a sieve. Make a white sauce of half a cupful of butter, half a cupful of flour and a quart of milk. When boiling stir in the hot tomato, season to taste and serve at once. Made in this manner, if the fresh tomatoes are not over-ripe or the canned goods too old, the soda may be omitted without danger of curdling.

Pirot Famous For Carpets.

Pirot is the center of an important Servian industry. Pirot carpets, blue and red, are to be found in every Servian home and have gained fame beyond the Balkans. They nearly all are made in private houses, entirely by hand, often without even a shuttle, the workers using no patterns, but artistic instinct producing harmonious results. The art has been acquired no doubt from the Turks, who learned it from the Persians, but Pirot carpets have qualities of their own. Colors and materials are so strong that it is almost impossible to wear them out.—London Chronicle.

Modish Skating Costume

Designed by Franklin Simon & Co., New York.

THIS suit is a very appropriate style for skating. To give a wintry touch the suit is fur trimmed, and a high fur collar and wide belt are modish details. The skirt is made with a wide, full swing and is simply finished with a wide hem. The collar is made entirely of Hudson seal, and seal also trims the pockets. The brim of the pretty skating cap is of seal, and the white velvet crown is trimmed with a fur ball. The suit is shown in brown, green, navy or wine.

British Workers Unite.

The largest labor organization in the history of England, representing about 2,000,000 men, was formed in London recently for the purpose of offensive or defensive action in matters respecting wages and conditions of work. The organizations composing the alliance are the Miners' federation, the National Union of Railway Men and the National Transport Workers' union. The constitution adopted provides that joint action can be taken only after the consent of the three organizations concerned is obtained.

White Skirts For Spring Wear.

A four-gored skirt of white serge, made with pleated side gores and trimmed with large pockets.

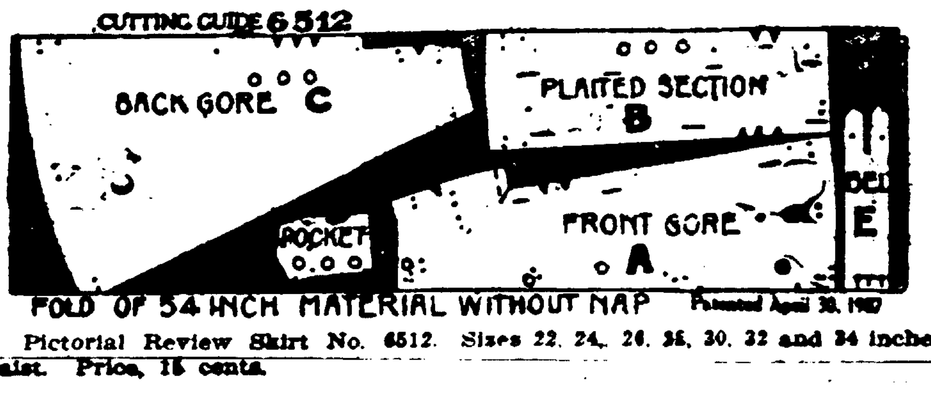
White materials are much in evidence for separate skirts designed for spring wear. Ratine, cloth, serge and cotton corduroy are the most fashionable because all of these fabrics launder perfectly. The skirt shown here is carried out in white serge. It is a four-piece model with high waist-line, and there is a pleated section between the gores above which appear patch pockets.

In medium size the skirt requires 2¾ yards 54-inch material. The width about the lower edge of the skirt is about 3 yards. Before cutting the material fold it carefully in half. Only the belt is placed on the lengthwise fold. The pleated section, the front and back gores and the pocket are all laid on a lengthwise thread of the goods.

If a shorter length is desired, cut off from lower edges of gores and pleated section or turn a hem the desired amount.

The belt is novel in its arrangement and is easily made, if it is remembered that the small "o" perforations indicate the center. Adjust to position. Center-fronts and center-backs even, the center of the belt over the upper edge of the skirt. Lap the ends in front as illustrated and finish with buttons or braid ornaments.

Although the full skirt is now the rule rather than the exception, it is a noticeable fact that the fulness has been gained by gathers, pleats and circular cuts, which makes the new designs extremely interesting and forerunners of things to come.



Pictorial Review Skirt No. 6512. Sizes 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32 and 34 inches waist. Price, 15 cents.

The Salad Bowl.

ASSORTED FRUIT SALAD.—Prepare finely cut celery with the shredded whites of hard boiled eggs. Mash the yolks to a smooth paste with skinned and boned sardines and shape the mixture into balls, dipping them at last into a little of the dry yolk so as to make them a rich yellow. Dress the celery and egg whites with French dressing or mayonnaise, put the mixture on a bed of lettuce.

Whole Tomato Salad.—Scald some large, fully ripe and yet firm tomatoes; remove skins and put them against the ice for several hours. Put a whole tomato on one or two lettuce leaves, dress with well chilled mayonnaise and serve in this individual manner. This salad is meat and drink in point of nutriment, and many persons find it quite enough for the substantial dish of a Sunday night tea.

Fish Salad.—A delicious salad which is yet something out of the regular course is made of Bismarck herrings, three of which would make a dish large enough for several persons. Put the herrings in a bowl and cover them with a dressing made of olive oil, cayenne, horseradish and sliced white onion; add a tablespoonful of sauce and one of walnut ketchup. After the fish has soaked some time in the dressing, arrange it in a bed of lettuce finely shredded with the fingers and pour over the sauce.

Pickled Mussel Salad.—Line a bowl with thin strips of hard toast, then put in a pile of pickled mussels, dressing with oil and vinegar in which some sliced onion has soaked for awhile. The mussels can be had bottled, and all the good fish stores keep the freshly prepared ones once the season for them arrives. Add enough of the pickle liquid to moisten the toast.

Cheese Salad.—Rub cottage cheese to a smooth paste with cream, butter and salt; make the mixture into balls. Then rub a salad bowl with a cut clove of garlic and fill it with chicory or endive cut into narrow strips; border the bowl with the cheese balls after the center part of the salad has been treated to a French dressing.

Almond Salad.—Stone and chop six fat pimento olives; add half a cupful of blanched almonds cut fine and the same quantity of finely cut celery. Serve on lettuce with mayonnaise made without mustard.

What We Eat.

It has been estimated that on the average each resident of this country annually consumes 80.3 pounds of beef, 7.5 of veal, 6.5 of mutton, 10 of lard and 67.5 of pork, a total of practically 172 pounds. In addition each of us eats, on the average, 17.5 pounds of butter, 3.8 pounds of cheese, 17 pounds of ice cream, 1.5 pounds of oleomargarine and about 475 pounds of milk.

KITCHEN CUES.

Simple Ways of Doing Simple Things Intelligently and Well.

To prevent potatoes becoming black when cooked put them into cold water and when brought to the boil squeeze a little lemon juice in. They will then keep a good color and be of good flavor.

Before using tinware of any kind rub it well over with fresh lard. If treated in this way it will never rust.

Slip a thimble on the curtain rod when running it through the hem of the curtain.

The tops of pale covered evening gloves make very dainty shoes for babies.

For a homemade coal box procure a wooden lard bucket from the grocer. Remove the wire handle and clean thoroughly inside and outside with strong soda water, one pound to a gallon of boiling water. Purchase a three penny bottle of oak varnish and when the bucket is dry apply over evenly and quickly. Leave for several hours. Get two penny bronze handles and screw one on each side, and the article is complete. The outside cost of this is a quarter, and it looks as well as one costing several times that amount.

White satin shoes should always be kept in blue paper to prevent them from becoming discolored.

After fowl of any kind is cleaned the inside should be rubbed thoroughly with a piece of lemon before the dressing is put in.

When ivory handled knives look yellow rub them with fine sandpaper or emery. It will take off the spots and restore the whiteness.

If clothespins are dipped in white enamel paint and dried in the sun they can be kept perfectly clean and will not split or mark the clothes.

Tin that has become rusty or stained may be cleaned by dipping the cut surface of a raw potato in fine brick and rubbing well with this.

Fielding at Lisbon.

Lisbon contains the grave of Henry Fielding. It was on Oct. 4, 1754, that Fielding died in the Portuguese capital, and it was in 1830 that his tomb was erected in the English cemetery. And Fielding didn't like Lisbon. "As the houses, convents, churches, etc., are large," he wrote, "and all built with white stone, they look beautiful at a distance, but as you approach nearer and find them to want every kind of ornament all idea of beauty vanishes at once." At that time a voyage to Lisbon was an undertaking not lightly to be contemplated. It took Fielding exactly fifty days of foul weather.—St. James' Gazette.

"MY AUTO, 'TIS OF THEE"

My auto, 'tis of thee, short cut to poverty—of thee I chant. I blew a pile of dought on you two years ago, and now you quite refuse to go, or won't or can't. Through town and countryside, you were my joy and pride; a happy day. I loved thy gaudy hue, thy nice white tires so new, but now you're down and out for true, in every way, to thee, old rattle box, came many bumps and knocks; for thee I grieve. Badly the top is torn, frayed are thy seats and worn; the whooping cough effects thy horn, I do believe. Thy perfums swells the breeze while good folks choke and wheeze, as we pass by. I paid for thee a price, 'twould buy a mansion twice, now everybody's yelling "ice" I wonder why? Thy motor has the grippe, thy spark plug has the pip and woe is thine. I too have suffered chills, ague and kindred ills, endeavoring to pay my bills since thou were mine. Gone is my bank roll now, no more 'twould choke the cow, as once before. Yet, if I had the mon, so help me John—amen, I'd buy myself a car again and speed some more. —Exchange.

FROSTY EVENING FOR NON. TEAM

In the City Bowling league match on the Onyx alleys last night, the Nondescripts had a walkaway and took three straights from the N. G.'s. The victory was due in a measure to the poor bowling of the N. G. team also to the fact that the Nondescript bowlers were able to maintain a steady game in thep inches.

The honors of the match were divided between "Chick" Tallman and Powell of the winning outfit. Tallman had high game score of 222; Powell took the honors for high game and best average. The results were:

The victory places the Nondescript in first place by a safe margin, with the West Side team second.

COPPER INGOTS IN LARD PAILS

Liverpool—The newspapers in discussing the seizure of the cargo of the Swedish-American line steamship the Stockholm publish a report that pails supposed to contain 500 tone of lard really contained copper ingots, while exceedingly heavy parcel post packages contained a large quantity of rubber.

Maritime circles were much mystified yesterday by the news from London that the British Admiralty had ordered the Swedish steamship Stockholm, which left here for Gothenburg on aJnuary 3, to proceed from Kirkwall to Liverpool, forcing the vessel to retrace more than five hundred miles of her voyage for the purpose of discharging 567 tone of cargo. The Stockholm arrived at Liverpool yesterday.

When the Stockholm left New York with a large cargo, including provisions, it was stated that the vessel would stop at Kirkwall. British authorities who examined the cargo seized a considerable part of the provisions.

GIVING UP ADVERTISING!

GOING OUT OF BUSINESS!

The last sentence is a logical deduction of the first one; but in this case, GIVING UP ADVERTISING means CREATING BUSINESS FOR FULTON MERCHANTS AND FULTON PEOPLE. With The Evening Times, Giving up advertising means refusal to accept the voluntary business of merchants located in Oswego and Syracuse. It's a case of handing back real money to the man who wants trade from Fulton.

The Times is Handing Back Real Money Every Day to Out-of-Town Merchants

Because the agreement was made in good faith and with eyes open to the seriousness of the situation. To refuse out-of-town advertising is to do something for our town—your town. ## CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

In the edition of the London Times for September 1, 1911, a brief article appeared upon the proposed capital of Australia. A site some seventy miles from the eastern coast line, in New South Wales, at Yass Canderra has been selected, and it is expected that there will be established the permanent seat of government, where the federal parliament will meet and the commonwealth legislation be enacted. In time, there will be built a parliament house, government buildings, post-offices, college and university buildings, museums, markets, parks, and all the paraphernalia of a great city. Before anything is done, however, the government has called for competitive designs upon all phases of the problem, to be submitted upon a given date. This item of news is introduced here to indicate how the people of Australia propose to build a capital city-by first carefully planning it.

Every town or village has some sort of a plan. It may be one that is worked out in the first place or one that evolved later, but the town does not move far in its history before a paper plan has been accepted by the civil authorities. The expansion of most of the towns of modern times is the result of real estate enterprises, and their purpose has been to sell lots rather than to look at the community as a social organization with a future; so towns have grown by accretions called in the real estate world additions. These are plotted with the single purpose in view just referred to, and in carrying it out the adherence to accepted ideas, shown usually in the checkerboard form of plotting is a customary feature of real estate promotion. There are other instances of town planning of a special character resulting from the purposes of some manufacturing concern to devise a town which it can control, in planning, organization and government, and in many instances such places are really model towns that hold up an example for the imitation of the slower going communities.

But very few towns are planned with much of the future in view; if they were, we should not find the embarassment and limitations to town growth brought about by high values of property in private hands, but we should find provisions made in the plans for the needs of the inhabitants and the protection of comfort and decency through control over surrounding lands. Only within the past few years has there been any consideration given to the need of plotting the land around as well as inside the town limits, and that has been done mostly abroad; thus it is left for future generations to wonder why the present dwellers in towns did not protect themselves by looking after the open places, school sites, and other public needs.

In general without defining the destinction there are two types of town planning. One may be called the formal and the other the informal type. In the first class are the checkerboard, diagonal and round forms of city plans, while included in the second are the garden cities and the individual plans made to fit topagraphical conditions. New York City set the seal of approval upon the gridiron system in the working out of the city plans above Feurteenth street. This form is the simplest and it provides an accurate method of property description, though it has the disadvantage of requiring every citizen to pass around two sides of a block to reach a given point and it utalizes an usually large portion of the land for street puroses. The diagonal type of plan wasu sed by L'Enfant in the laying ont of the city of Washington. The ring plan as planned in the European cities, is seen more particularly in the case of Vienna, where the old forticication. were used as a foundations of the boulevards extending abounr the city. Opposedto these forms are the town, of the information in England more than anywhere else, largely for the purpose of giving a natural setting to modern industry.

THIRD TURKISH ARMY DEFEATED IN RUSSIAN'S LATEST GREAT VICTORY

Petrograd, via London.-The defeat of the Third Turkish army in the Caucasus, resulting in its retirement upon Erzerum, is regarded here as a greater victory than that at Cari Kamysh a year ago, when these same troops were so demoralized that they were only recently enabled to resume the offensive.

Th entire Eleventh Corps and parts of the Ninth and Tenth of the Turkish army were engaged in the battle in the neighborhood of Lake Tortum, according to the military authorities here. Behind these were concentrated the reserves from the Ninth and the garrison of the Erzerum fortress. In spite of the most skilful handling of the Turkish divisions, however, they were unable to withstand the sudden and unexpected onrush of the Russians against the centre.

The campaign began toward the end of summer. During autumn three Turkish divisions were thrown back at Olti and along the seacoast, while in the district of Lake Van a division under Halil Bey was defeated. The operations toward Urumiah ended with the defeat of the Persians, Turks and Germans, thus guaranteeing the safety of the Russian flanks.

In December, the Russians began an active attack against the Turkish centre, and on January 3 broke thel ines of the Eleventh Corps, so that these forces were obliged to returne in disorder. Evidently, according to Russian military authorities, the Turks had not forgotten the lesson of Sari Kamysh, when, in trying to rescue the Ninth and Tenth corps, as they were then constituted. They did not risk a similar manoeuvre on this occasion, but permitted the flanks to be unmolested, massing their farces against the central positions.

Not until three days after the beginning of the retreat of the main Turkish army was an attempt made to threaten the Russian right along the sea. This offensive was quickly stopped. After a breach had been forced in the positions of the Eleventh corps the retreat became a rout, the Turks, falling back upon the Erzerum fort ess. leaving dead and wounded, guns and equipment behind.

The defeat of the Turks, it is asserted, was particularly disastrous in the direction of Koprukoui,-where by artillery attacks, followed by assaults with the bayonet, the Russian virtually destroyed three regiments, leaving the key to the Erzerum positions in Russian possission. It is said that after the Sari Kamysh battle the Turks were able to hold this position.

The operations on the southwestern front have taken on the character of trench warfare, the two sides being in close contact and strongly entrenched. Offensive movements have ceased for the time being on the Middle Stripo and in the district of Czernowitz. The Russian oeffensive, however, continues on the Lower Stripa and the Liniester, where the Russians have tried to break through the enemy positions and menace the flank based on Buczacz, and have captured the strategically important village of Dabrova.

400,000 RAILROAD MEN VOTE--BALLOTS ON WAGE DEMAND OF BIG ARMY

New York—For the first time in the history of American railroads employes of every road in this country are voting simultaneously on the question of extending authority to their union leaders to present in their behalf demands for increased wages. If adopted the demands will represent the action of 400,000 men employed in the actual operation of al ltrains, although the higher wage rates will bereceived only by the men in the freight and yard services.

Heretofore, the demands for increased wages always have been made by the employes of specified sections of the country. InI the present action, however, sectional boundaries have been cast aside, and every member of the four brotherhoods of railroad employes—enginemen, firemen, brakemen and trainmen—are balloting and will submit their demands as a single body, In the past most of the wage disputes have been settled by arbitration, but in the present instance by arbitration, but in the present instance many of the most influential of the labor leaders have announced their determination to make afi nish fight and that they are unalterably opposed to submitting their demands to arbitration.

The exact form in which the demands will be made will not be known until March 1, when the balloting will be completed. Enough has been accomplished in this direction already, it was asserted pesterday to makec ertain that the men are in favor of the demands.

The demands contemplated by the leaders of the brotherhoods provide that the basic pay day for train operatives, for all excepting passenger service, shall be changed to a hundred miles or eight hours. The basis of computation now is one hundred miles or ten hours. In both instances over time is paid at one and a half times the ordinary rate. Thus, the demand of the men is that the freight speed rate for wages computing purposes sholl be increased from ten to twelve and a half miles an hour, or 25 per cent. and the overtime rate increased 87 1-2 per cent.

The combined payroll of all the railroad in this country now is close to $1,500,000,000. The employes number approximately 1,800,000. In 1910 the combined payroll was $1,140,000,000 for 1,700,000. For the same number of men in 1914 the payroll was $1,470,000,000

Statistics provided by the companies show that for every dollar now received by the roads for carrying freight and passengers the employes get forty-five cents. The wages of men actually engaged in the operation of train in approximately $400,000,000 a year. While these employes constitute only 19 per cent of the companies' e-, oyes the y absord 28 per cent of the total amount of the jayroll.

Should the demands about to be presented be adopted an engine driver now paid $5 for a run of 100 miles in ten hours, or at the rate of fifty cents an hour, then would receive $5 for the first eight hours, or sixty-two and a half cents an hour. For the next two hours he would receive ninety-three and three-fourths cents an hour, or $1 87 for the overtime, making a total of $6.87 for the same service now costing the railroads, $5.

FIRE DAMAGES THE DIX STORE

A fire which originated from unknown sources called out the Fire Department at 2:30 o'clock this morning to the building occupied by the Dix Millinery store in South Second st. An estimated damage of $500 was done on the building, while the millinery stock will have to be gone over to ascertain the damage done. Insurance is carried on the stock and the building.

The fire was first discovered by Miss Trixie Dix who occupied a room immediately over the store. She was awakened by the rumbling produced by the flames and hastily making her way to the depot, she sent in a telephone alarm. Another person immediately after sent in an alarm from the box on the corner.

According to Fire Chief Waugh, the fire started in a room in the rear of the store proper and made rapid headway up the staircase leading to the kitchen of the living quarters upstairs. When the department responded the rear room was a roaring furnace and volumes of smoke were pouring from the rear windows into the alleyway of the Massaro store. Chief Waugh directed the operations of the firemen and had lines of hose laid in thef ront as well as the rear of the building. the former intended to prevent a spread of the flames into that section of the building.

The situation appeared threatening as there are a number of buildings closely adjoining the Dix Store. It was feared that the barn belonging to the Massaro company also Dr. Hall's barn would take fire. After hard work of an hour and three-quarters the fire was totally extinguished.

The members of the Dix family, following Miss Dix's discovery of the fire, made a hurried exit to the street. They experienced no difficulty in making their escape from the burning building as they were able to leave their living rooms by a staircase other than the one burning.

The stock in the store proper suffered as a result of the smoke and water, but was not touched by the flames, the firemen being able to keep the flame sconfined within the area in which the fire originated.

METZ BOMBARDED BY FRENCH AIRMEN

Paris, via London.—Theo communication issued by the War office tonight tells of an important air raid against the fortress of Metz. It says:

"On January 23 two of our groups of aeroplanes, comprising twenty-four machines, bombarded the railway stations and barracks at Metz. One hundred and thirty shells were launched against the objects designated. The bombarding aeroplanes were escorted by two protecting squadrons, the pilots of which during the trip engaged in ten ocmbats with fokkers and aviatiks.

"Our aeroplanes were violently cannonaded along the whole of their course, but returned undamaged, except one only, which was obliged to make a landing to the southeast of Metz."

The Knickerbocker Caramel Paste Company is plaintiff in an action which was tried this afternoon before Judge Wilson, the New York Central Railroad company being the defendants.

The case arises from the use of a barrel of caramel paste by the former proprietors of the Paradise Candy Kitchen, which the plaintiff claims the railroad company should not have released.

VIEWS OF STATE EDITORS

The Wilson administration was perilously near shipwreck when the war in Europe gave this country a boom in special lines of industry—but the rocks are still there! The worst rock in the group is half submerged now. It should be labelled "failure to protect the American workingman againist the competition of Europe in labor cost." When the tide recedes the rock will loom up as dark and dangerous as ever. What are we going to do about it? Shall we change the pilot on our ship of state, or shal. we permit Pilot Wilson to run another risky voyage along that coast. —Pougkeepsie Evening Star.

EXPOSE THE SHAM

Never in the history of this city has insincerity, sham and selfishness been more remorselessly, fatally exposed than right now—during the administration of Victor C. Lewis. Opportunity, not for mere service to the people of Fulton, but for service to all who are interested in good government, in every town, knocks at this city's door. Mr. Lewis has the power and he has behind him public confidence. What he now needs is public support. What other men have lacked, a united sentiment, he should be capable of securing. Mr. Lewis's voice can command hundreds of men, and those who refuse would be overwhelmed by those who do.

It has been asked of Mr. Lewis that he show honesty and simple sincerity, that he stick to what he knows to be right; that he follow the example and the precedent of men who have given good service to the people of other cities. It is apparent that he has not listened to any great extent to the men whose only thoughts are selfish, who want the city within their grasp at any price, and decent people should honor his deafness.

Because Mr. Lewis wants to do right, because he is truthful, he should bring to his side the fruits of honesty and sincerity—the support of men and women who are willing to give their lives that honesty may prevail, and to bring down upon the heads of the shammers real humiliation and shame, thus administering to them a wholesome, enduring lesson.

---

Judging from all the complaints, it is necessary to make against all the administrations this city has had, one begins to wonder who is to become the innocent bystander in the present muddle.

MAKING FARMS MORE PROFITABLE

The report of the Oneida County Farm Bureau ought to be placed in the hands of every farmer in the county. Then every farmer ought to read it. Every member of the Board of Supervisors ought also to read the report, for the satisfaction that it will give him because of his support to the institution. Governor Whitman might read the account with profit, for it ought to persuade him that cutting the State appropriation of $25,000 for farm bureaus in half is false economy.

This report deals with a number of farm activities and gives results in figures, and sometimes in dollars and cents. It doesn't give the man from Missouri any room for doubt.

Here, for instance, is the work with orchards. There are now 22 orchards which are receiving attention according to advanced ideas. These are pruned and sprayed and some of them are cultivated, and the result is that the orchards which are taken care of do not suffer "off years." They bear every year, which is quite a miracle. However, instead of growing surplus limbs and wood, the energy is shifted into fruit. That is the business of the orchardist. As an illustration, an orchard in Clinton is mentioned. It produces this year 1,200 bushels of apples which sold for from $1.25 to $2 per bushel. The orchard wasn't producing anything of any account and was not profitable before the owner handled it as the "farm doctor" suggested that it be treated.

There are the cow testing associations which affect 103 dairies with 2,560 cows, and "the results accomplished speak in terms of money gain to the dairymen." Once a month each dairy is tested and "a complete business record is made of each of the 2,560 cows." The cost of keeping each cow and her product is known. Thus the cows which do not pay their way and leave no profit are shown up in no uncertain manner. There is no guesswork about it.

The bureau has demonstrated that "alfalfa can be grown in practically any part of the county and in most cases with profit." After establishment alfalfa has given three or four cuttings with a yield of from four to six tons per acre, says the bureau.

Another crop spoken of is potatoes. Here again figures are again produced to show what spraying does for potatoes. On the Wicks Brothers farm in Paris unsprayed potatoes produced 99 bushels, while the sprayed ones yielded 198 bushels per acre. The cost of materials and labor per acre, together with depreciation of the sprayer was $8.14. The net increase in cold cash because of spraying on a field of 11 acres was $563.

It is such figures as these that "talk," and they speak with the emphasis which can not be mistaken. It throws an interesting light on back-lot theories and opinions on "book farming" and "going to college to learn farming." The fact is that the practical farmer hooked up with the information gained by the experiment stations makes a combination that is exceptionally productive and profitable.

While the bureau can show results in individual cases, such as these instances mentioned, it can not sum up its entire work in dollars and cents. Its direct work is plainly far more profitable to the county that the cost, but the influence which can not be measured is where the greatest gain is acquired. How can not figure, for instance, how much it is worth to have improved methods of farming among numerous farmers in increasing numbers from now through future years? It can't be neasured, but the net result must prove to be very great,—Utica Observer.

Opinions

THEY ARE STARTING WRONG

Representative Richard Olney, 2d, from the 14th Massachusetts District, has introduced a bill to create a non-partisan Tariff commission.

With all respect to Congressman Olney and the supporters of a Tariff commission, we want to say that they are starting wrong. What we need is an upward revision of the Tariff to a point where American labor and capital is safely Protected, and then it will be time to put a commission into the field to help in a revision downward, where such a course is necessary.

If leading business men favor a permanent Tariff commission, if President Wilson and his advisers favor it; what more evidence is needed that the present Tariff is wrong? Admitting it to be wrong, Congress should correct its error and then from a safe position make adjustments.—Fibre and Fabric.

ULTRA-FREAKISHNESS

Most of Cleveland's city officials and six of its seven school directors failed to pass a mentality test which a majority of the patients in an asylum met very easily. The test used is named the "Binet" and is now officially used on all Cleveland school children.

The results of the test when applied to the city fathers and the insane patients were made public by those who are opposed to the Binet system and who are fighting for the abolishment of it. Since 1,674 school children have already been declared mentally defective as a result of the test there would seem to be some grounds for the opposition. According to the procedure in vogue in Cleveland a child to be normal must after hearing it once, repeat: "I saw in the street a pretty little dog. He had curly brown hair, short legs and a long tail."

Sometimes there are freak innovations which are absurd on the face of them. If the opponents of the Binet test are at all accurate in their assertions—this is one of the cases in which freakishness has gone too far.—Batavia News.

"THE MAN OF KNOWLEDGE"

"The man of knowledge is far superior to the ignorant man, under any and all circumstances."

The above is the text of a preachment in the Peoria, Illinois, Transcript. It is a broad statement, and is made with unusual definiteness of assertion. The term knowledge is used to indicate the man of education and the word ignorant to designate the man who lacks education. It is the old lamentable classification which the public is always making in which it regards knowledge and education as the same thing.

The Transcript should know that the scholar—the man of knowledge—is frequently far inferior to the unlettered man in the rough and tumble of life. Knowledge belongs to education, but is by no means all of education. One of life's experience that is very common to the lot of the college man is the sight of the unlettered individual outstripping him in the race because the other possesses that greatest essential of education, a knowledge of men.

George Ade made a speech at James Whitcomb Riley's banquet a few weeks ago. The guests were toasting Riley as the Lincoln of American verse, just as a few year previous they had toasted Mark Twain as the king of American prose. Both Riley and Clemens sprung from the common people, and there was much the same trend of thought in the speeches at Indianapolis in honor of the Laird of Lockerbie Street and those in New York a few years previous, when Twain reached Pier No. 70. Here is an extract from Ade's speech:

"Some of you visitors occasionally pass through Indiana as rapidly as possible. You look out of the car window, and see the Hoosier on the depot platform, necktieless and slightly bunched at the knees. Applying the latest cabaret standards, you classify him as a simpleton, the same as you see in the moving pictures.

"Alight from the train and get close to our brother, before you turn in you verdict.

"Forget that he shaves his neck and remember than many a true heart beats beneath galluses.

"Pick out a low roomy box on the sunny side of the general store, and listen with open mind while he discourses on silo-feed for cattle, how to cast for black bass, the necessity for preparedness, General Lew Wallace, Christian Science, the inwardness of the flare-up between Wilson and Bryan, and how to find a bee tree.

"He may wear the wrong kind of a hat, but he is alert on men and affairs and living doctrines."—Watertown Times.

FORMS OF PUBLIC GRAFT

The inquiry into the expenses of the Thompson Legislative Committee which has been probing the First District Public Service Commission's affairs, suggests the old saying that the public pays double. A private excursion of like character would be carefully financed—provided the excursionists had to help foot the bills; and the items would receive minute inspection as regards their legitimacy. In public junkets and similar undertakings the rule seems to be to "charge all the business will stand." and usually the bill is paid and nobody is the wiser.

A member of the committee protests that although the Hotel Biltmore charged $300 for his alleged accommodation at the hostelry, he actually lived at home and spent not more than $10 at the hotel. A little matter of $290 is not too closely scrutinized, as a rule, in analyzing the bills for public entertainment. The hotel bill of the Thompson Committee totalled $5,320—a pretty penny for the accommodation of a half dozen of the state's officers in New York for a week, even though hotel fares ... t that the public business seems al... bably run parallel.

No doubt the committeemen have performed an important service in discovering the admitted inefficiency of the downstate commission and its serious lapses from duty. But why should the state pay more? Why is it that thep ublic business seems always to be regarded as the legitimate ways to be regarded as the legtimate medium for exacting the very highest charges for the least possible amount of service?

When good goverment really is ushered in, if it ever is, there will be a readjustment which will put public expenditures and public service on a par with private expenditures and private service. But the germ of graft, in its multifarious forms, seems to have been sown so widely that the realization seems almost hopeless. Hardly anybody considers it a form of graft to "soldier" on a public job. "The state is rich," or "The city's rich," is a palliative too familiar. Yet to accept big fees for doing nothing, and to do nothing for big fees, is certainly graft.—Auburn Adv-Journal.

Figures are very deceptive, according to former Judge Daniel G. Taylor, who has a portly figure himself.

"The negro porter gave me my change and started to fix the berth and then asked me what size bill I had given him. I said $5 and that he had given me $4 change. He said that was correct.

"Then the porter turned to the other passenger and asked him about the change for the bill. He replied that he had given the porter $4 and $1 for the berth. The porter again said that was right.

"The porter kept puzzling, and I asked him what was wrong. He said he was trying to figure where the railroad would get the $2 for the two berths.

Washington—A Mississippi member of Congress is telling a good story on himself. For some weeks past he has been receiving letters by almost every mail from one of his constituents asking him to send him some of the free seed sent out each year by the congressman and making an especial appeal for peas. Finally the demand for peas become so large from this constituent, that the member of Congress wrote the applicant in these terms: "I am sending you half a dozen more packages of peas, as you requested. Say, what are you trying to do down there, plant the whole state to peas?" A few days later he got this reply: "No, I am not planting them. They make bully soup. Send along some more."

"Our Democratic friends are in ag reat quandary on this rev enue question," said an Ohio Congressman to a group of his colleagues who were discussing the resolution continuing the "war tax" for another year. The trouble is they do not know what to do. Some of the Democrats want to issue bonds to meet the big deficit that confronts the administration, but there are a whole lot of members of that party to whom a bond issue looks like a nightmare. These latter want something devised in the way of direct taxes in the way of a revenue producer and they are laying awake nights trying to discover something to tax that will not tread too hard on the toes of the American people. It is really amusing to see them trying to paddle to safety and it is intensely galling to them to realize that had the duties been prevailing under the provisions of the Payne-Aldrich bill, present importations would have furnished enough revenue to meet the running expenses of the government, notwithstanding the extravagant and lavish expenditures of the sixty-third Congress."

The Pennsylvania State Grange has adopted resolutions condemning the changes made by the Post Office Department in the rural service in that State. There might be an exception in the case of Texas, for Postmaster General Burleson hailsf rom that state and is said to contemplate running for the Senate.

Facts are stubborn things—the most stubborn things that obstruct the path of the Democratic party in its effort to remain in national control. For instance, when the Democrats reduced the tariff on leather manufactures, our imports increased 50 per cent, as shown by statistics compiled by this administration. The American workmen employed in glove and boot and shoe factories lost employment in corresponding degree, but we bought gloves and shoes no cheaper. New England factory workers who lost their jobs quit buying so freely of other commodities. All retail merchants know this, and the Democrats can't explain it away, for the facts, stubborn things that they are, are contained in official records."

Congressman Henry of Texas is a candidate for the Senate, and he announces his intention of leaving Washington in the Spring to go home to attend to his campaign. We hope no Republican will pair with him. The Democratic margin in the House is so slender that a few men like Henry would give control to the Republicans. Next fall will be early enough for campaigning. Meantime there is no public business to be looked after. If the Democrats don't want to stay and attend to it, the Republicans should be right there on the job.

MODERN HIGHWAYS AND BOULEVARDS

Appearance of City Depends Much on Streets.

MUST NOT DETERIORATE.

Point of View of Average American Toward the Street Problem Is Largely Responsible For Bad Conditions, Which Almost Universally Prevail. Varying Widths Should Be Provided.

By FRANK KOESTER,
Author of "Modern City Planning and Maintenance."

The appearance of a city and the impression which visitors as well as residents receive are dependent far more than is popularly supposed upon the appearance of the street itself—that is, the street surface—as considered apart from the buildings.

In order that the streets may have the best possible appearance, they should be constructed by competent and experienced engineers and when in use must not be allowed to deteriorate. Repairs should be made at the slightest sign of a break. If the repairs are neglected the breaks become rapidly larger, with a consequent quickly mounting increase in the cost of making the street good again, while during the time the breaks exist the appearance of the street is spoiled, and unless the breaks are repaired its appearance is never as good as before.

The point of view of the average American toward the streets is largely responsible for the bad conditions which almost invariably prevail. The American seems to regard streets as a sort of necessary evil and their repair as a more or less superfluous expense. He seems to feel that as only one vehicle at a time passes over a hole a little care on the part of the driver would save the city the expense of the repairs.

Americans have in reality little or no conception of the condition in which a street should be maintained until they have seen the remarkably smooth and clean streets of European cities. Their excellence, which might easily be rivaled by American streets, is due to the thorough methods of construction and the high degree of engineering skill retained.

In a city the arrangement of highways must be such that the citizens who traverse them in great numbers may be enabled to reach their destinations with the greatest possible dispatch, for a large part of the time of the public is consumed in merely going from place to place. The daily movements of the population should thus be studied with the utmost thoroughness and the streets laid out so that access to the different parts of the city may be had from all the other parts in the most direct manner possible.

In order to afford ample facilities for traffic and at the same time to avoid unnecessary outlays streets in varying widths should be provided. It will usually be found that streets of three different widths will suffice for practically all purposes; that is to say, main thoroughfares, secondary thoroughfares and local streets.

As a rule it is better to err on the side of having streets too wide than too narrow. A city should have as a minimum 20 per cent of its area devoted to streets, while 40 per cent is a far better allowance. The streets of the city of Washington, which are unusually wide and imposing, occupy 54 per cent of the city's total area.

A Prussian law of 1875, enacted to cover the streets of Berlin, prescribed that the main streets should be ninety-five feet or more in width, secondary thoroughfares from sixty-five to ninety-five feet and the local streets from forty to sixty-five feet. Another standard for secondary German cities, such as Dusseldorf, Cologne, Frankfort and Danzig, is: Main thoroughfares 85 to 120 feet, secondary thoroughfares 50 to 80 feet and local streets 35 to 48 feet.

With his wife the clergyman resides at the home of Mrs. Furnald, 34 West Seventy-second street.

Mrs. Furnald was the mother of four children, all of whom are dead, the last dying in 1899. Her husband died in 1907. Her only living relative is an aunt, eighty years old, who has no relatives. She had hoped to be able to perpetuate the family name through an adoption.

She met Mr. Natsch when he was a student in the Union Theological seminary in 1902 and shortly after he went west to live with Mr. and Mrs. Furnald. He married Miss Ethel Helena Budington on Dec. 2, 1914, and the two made their home with Mrs. Furnald. Mr Natsch now becomes Henry Natsch Furnald, and his wife's name changes accordingly. Mrs. Furnald has a substantial estate, which, she says, she will leave to her adopted son.

EVOLUTION OF A TRADE UNION

How the Boot and Shoe Workers Grew and Prospered.

RECORD OF GOOD SERVICE

Since Control Over Strikes Was Given to the National Organization the Wages of Its Members Have Been Protected—High Dues and Benefits Aids to Success.

The record of the Boot and Shoe Workers' union is one of evolution and service, unity and progress, construction and success, says the Boot and Shoe Workers' Journal.

It did not start under the most auspicious circumstances. We realize this fact better as we look back on its history. It started in April, 1895, with the declaration on the part of the then existing organizations of shoe workers that there should be one union in the trade. But the financial plan of the new organization was weak. It was based upon low dues and a low per capita tax. It was based also on local autonomy. Each local union could do entirely as it pleased and did so. If such action resulted in a strike the national union could not support it, because no provisions had been made. The union was not built that way.

In 1898 the first arbitration contract was made. In 1899 a new constitution was adopted establishing twenty-five cent dues and also establishing sick, death and strike benefits in the control of the national union and giving the national union control over strikes.

In these two years the union changed from a mob to an organized force, and since the year 1899 the union has continually progressed in the direction of becoming constantly of more service and benefit to its members.

During these years of progress and of service since 1899, and in spite of the obstructive work of its enemies in 1903, 1909 and all the time, this union has protected the wages of its members through all periods, especially during the panic of 1907 and again through the long months of prostration owing to the present war in Europe. There has been no such thing as a slaughtering of the wages of the shoemakers since this union became efficient in the year 1899.

In addition to protecting the wages of its members against reduction, this union has been the means of constantly raising them, principally through the working out of the arbitration contract. In thousands upon thousands of instances the mere existence of this agreement to arbitrate has been the means of settling disputes by mutual adjustment and without arbitration and upon terms favorable to the workers. Arbitration cases have been won and arbitration cases have been lost, but mutual adjustments have always been successful.

This union has redeemed every pledge. Every legal sick and death benefit has been paid. Every strike that has been sanctioned has been paid its strike benefit to the end, no matter how long the period was. That strikes have been less numerous is a tribute to the efficiency of the service of the organization through its arbitration and mutual adjustment policy.

This union has won a standing not only in the labor world, but in the shoe world. We are recognized as a factor, and more than that, we are respected as a labor organization whose word and contract can be depended upon, and this in itself is an asset of no mean value, for when, as a labor organization, we are entitled to the respect of an employer, both because of our disposition and our strength, we are a long way on the road toward a satisfactory adjustment of any honest difference of opinion.

What does this union need for the future? It needs the undivided support of the shoe workers. With that support it can go on to heights of success not yet attained. Its service in the past has been valuable, its accomplishments great, but if this union is given the entire and undivided support of the shoe workers its progress will be still more rapid, its achievements still more great, and the strength of its position for the gaining of further advantages for the shoe workers of the present and future will be rapidly augmented, and the industrial position of this union will become more and more impregnable.

We have said that this union needs the undivided support of the shoe workers. Perhaps it were better to say that every shoe worker in America needs this union, for it has been proved that this union has succeeded and prospered fairly well without the support of a large proportion of shoe workers, who either have not supported any union at all or have done worse and supported independent factions. But how has it gone with the shoe workers who have remained aloof? They have not progressed in like proportion, and the most that can be said for them today is that they are a menace to the further progress of this organization and to their own.

This union will continue to progress and to give more and better service to its members anyway. Its progress will not be so fast as if the workers of the craft rallied to its standard, but it is bound to progress anyway, rapidly if permitted, but slowly if it must, because it has got into that habit.

SCHOOL FOR FIREMEN.

Novel Plan Inaugurated by Pittsburgh For Increasing Efficiency of Firemen.

personal supervision of Fire Chief James F. Richards and Police and Fire Surgeon D. E. Sable and the district chiefs. Actual instruction in modern fire fighting and other hazardous work entailed thereby will be under the direction of Captain James Kane, Fireman Alva Foster and Dr Sable, all of whom spent a month in the New York school of instruction.

The firemen are taking a deep interest in the work, and there is keen rivalry among the various companies to make the best showing.

The tower is ninety feet high, a six story building.

Ladder and hose drills, rescue work and instruction in pulmotor application are among the first lessons taught.

Family on Way to Church—One Child, 8, in Wagon, Escapes Unhurt—Happened at Scriba.

One killed and four members of the family seriously injured, is the latest tool as the result of a grade crossing accident, happening yesterday in Scriba. The head of the family, Frank Lawton, 50, was so badly injured that he died at the Oswego hospital at 11 o'clock last night. Four other members of his family escaped with their lives, but were seriously injured, when the wagon in which they were riding to church was struck by a train on the Ontario division of the New York Central railroad at 6:25 p. m.

The injured are:

Mrs. Maude Lawton, 45, wife of Frank Lawton, internal injuries, knee and spine injured, scalp wound and bruised.

Miss Alta Lawton, 17, their daughter, both legs fractured, scalp wound, lacerated face and bruised.

Mrs. Alta Lawton, 43, wife of George M. Lawton, spine injured, scalp wound and suffering from shock.

Miss Muriel Lawton, 14, her daughter, left leg fracutured, scalp wound and bruised.

On Way to Attend Church

The Lawtons left their home shortly after 6 o'clock and were on their way to attend the evening services at the Lycoming M. E. church. The only one in the wagon who was not injured was Harriet Lawton, 8 years old, daughter of Mrs. Alta Lawton. Edwin Lawton, 10, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Lawton, who was walking crossed the tracks some distance ahead of the wagon.

The train was made up of an engine and caboose and was in charge of Engineer Frank Walsh and conductor Frank Donnelly. It left Richland Junction at 5:30 o'clock and is said to have been running at a high rate of speed when the accident happened. There were no eyewitness to the accident.

The pilot of the engine struck one of the rear wheels of the wagon just as it crossed the track. The occupants were thrown in all directions. One of the girls being hurled more than forty feet. The wagon was demolished but the horse was not injured.

Residents in the vicinity removed the injured to the store of Newton Coe, located near the station. Dr. H. L. Wilder of Lycoming was summoned, and after administering first aid ordered the injured removed to Oswego.

Injured Taken on Train

The train, which came to a stop after the accident, was backed down to the station and the injured were placed aboard the caboose. The ambulance and other vehicles were waiting at the railway station when the train arrived.

The injured were taken to the Oswego hospital, where they were attended by Dr. Maurice J. McGrath, the railroad's physician, assisted by other doctors. Mrs. Frank Lawton was formerly Miss Maude Tully of Oswego and is a sister of George Tully of the Oswego Fire Department.

Mrs. Lawton is in a critical condition. She has internal injuries more serious than at first thought. Her daughter is also in a serious condition.

Mr. Lawton leaves another daughter, Mrs. Edward Wagemaker of East Williamson. He had lived at Lycoming all his life and was a well-known farmer.

BUFFALO WANTS CLEAN POLITICS

Buffalo— Every citizen was urged to adopt the policy, which the Chamber of Commerce intends to propagate of the working shoulder to shoulder with the new city council to give Buffalo clean government, by Frank B. Baird, newly elected president of the Chamber of Commerce, in a speech last night to the West Side Business Men and Taxpayers' Association at Mizpah Hall, Herkimer and West Ferry streets. Mr. Baird's subject was, "Cooperation." and he showed the value mutual aid has been to Buffalo and then ecessity for it now.

"Our predecessors are due an apology from us for we have not given them the credit which is theirs," said Mr. Baird. "We have been too prone to ask the question, What's the matter with Buffalo? Nothing is the matter with Buffalo. Cleveland has arisen to be ag reat city through the coal and ore wealth in its backyard, Detroit because of the immense pine regions to its north, Pittsburgh because of the coal and ore right at its door, while all Buffalo had was the lake at its west and indifference farming land on the east. But despite this Buffalo has advanced tremendously and with the barge canal completion in sight the city is facing an industrial boom that will be the greatest in its history.

"The city is fast coming into its own a cultured hightoned community, not rich but rapidly getting rich. Buffalo is in the forefrone educationally. That she is the largest city in the world to adopt commission form of government shows her adeptness to advance and every citizen should work shoulder to shoulder with the new city council to make the government a success."

Herbert A. Meldrum, retiring president of the Chamber of Commerce, spoke briefly in endorsement of Mr. Baird's policy. Richard C. O'Keefe, general secretary of the chamber, told of the new spirit of co-operation, and urged that the citizens share in it. A rising vote of thanks was given the speakers.

For fear you do not know what a good cholera cure you have in your MEDICATED SALT BRICK, I will tell you of an experiment I made with my fattening hogs. I had ten of them, when two died with cholera and the others were evidently going the same way, when I crushed two of your MEDICATED SALT BRICKS and diluted in the slop feed, all of which was eaten that day. The effect was quick and marked. I did not give them any more MEDICATED SALT BRICK or other medicine. I saw no more evidence of cholera or any other disease, they fattening perfectly afterwards. You have a most valuable remedy in BLACKMAN'S MEDICATED SALT BRICK.

ACTIVE SPRING TRADE COMING

Dun's Review of January 22, says: Requirements are so extensive that productive and trasportation facilities continue inadequate to meet current demands. Congestion of freight still prevails at the seaboard and, though railroads have made additions to rolling stock, domestic deliveries are increasingly difficult. This condition tends to further enhance the cost of commodities, while industrial expansion is checked at several points through inability to obtain raw materials. Except in isolated cases, there is no evidence that high prices are as yet lessening consumption, and it is significant that the prevailing disposition is still to contract ahead. Many traveling salesmen are sending in larger orders than usual and in some sections, notably in the Southwest, forward business is developing with exceptional rapidity. This not only indicates depleted merchandise stocks in distributing channels, but also affords convincing proof of general confidence in the future. All signs point to a very active spring trade, while current demands for heavyweight apparel and other seasonable goods are stimulated by continued cold weather over a wide area of the country. In some instances, however, excessively low temperatures have curtailed retail buying. Larger expenditures by the people are reflected in steadily improving mercantile collections, and the number of failures diminishes, the commercial mortality being much lighter than a year ago. Without exception, important statistical records make highly gratifying comparisons with those of earlier periods. Notwithstanding the reduced speculation in stocks and cotton, bank clearings this week show gains of 43.5 and 27.6 per cent., respectively, over the two immediately preceding years, while gross earnings of railroads thus far reported for January are 20.5 per cent. greater than in 1915. Latest available returns of oversea commerce movements disclose some contraction in merchandise exports, yet shipments continue on an enormous scale and during the first half of January exceeded imports by practically $100,000,000. In sipte of this influence sterling exchange holds steady, support being rendered by persistent liquidation of American securities by Europe

SAFE ROADS FOR HORSES WANTED

The New York State Association of Horsemen, the new organization having the interest of the horse as its purpose, has taken the first step in preparing its campaign to secure safe roads for horses. A call has gone out to the directors to obtain affidavits regarding injuries to horses or accidents resulting from the slippery and dangerous condition of state and other improved highways. These affidavits will be used in presenting the need of dirt or gravel side roads for horses to the proper authorities. The association will ask that all improved roads hereafter built be paralleled on either side by dirt or gravel drives for horses.

Eventually it is desired to have all macadam, concrete or brick roads so provided. The association is represented in nearly every county by a director, so the information obtained should cover the state. Accidents may also be reported to the secretary, Irving Parmeter at Watertown. A complaint has already ben made from Madison county, where one valuable horse suffered a fractured leg recently and many have sustained injuries by falling on slippery roads.

The horsemen's association has joined with the Safety First Society of New York in asking the appointment of a state traffic commision to recommend traffic rules to the Legislature and sonsider ways and means to bring about safety on the highways. Among the subjects for the proposed commission to consider are uniform traffic signals and road signs; the grade crossing menace, licensing of owners and drivers of automobiles and a revision of the traffic law. The enforcement of the highway law is one of the purposes of the New York State Association of Horsement, which wil be represented on the commission.

CARNEGIE MEDALS ARE AWARDED TO SEVENTEEN BY HERO COMMISSION

Nine of Those Honored Lost Their Lives In Efforts to Save Others Who at the Time Were In Distress.

Widows of Men Killed Are Awarded $35 a Month For Life or Until They Remarry—Each Child $5 a Month.

AT the twelfth annual meeting of the Carnegie hero fund commission at Pittsburgh seventeen acts of heroism were recognized. Four silver and thirteen bronze medals were awarded.

Nine of the heroes lost their lives, and to the dependents of four of these pensions aggregating $1,920 a year were granted. To the dependents of four of the others who lost their lives sums totaling $3,000 were granted, to be applied in various ways, subject to the direction of the commission.

In addition to these money grants, in one case the sum of $28,000 was appropriated for educational purposes, and in six cases awards aggregating $4,500 were made for other purposes. Payments in these cases will not be made until the beneficiaries' plans for the use of the awards have been approved by the commission.

The statement of the cases of heroism as given by the commission follows in part:

J. Lamar McCann of Tuscaloosa, Ala., was awarded a bronze medal. McCann, aged twenty-three, a student, saved Mary T. Hunter, aged twenty-two, and attempted to save Rex E. Partin, aged thirty-four, from drowning, at Tuscaloosa, Jan. 3, 1915. Partin and Miss Hunter fell from their canoe into the icy waters of the Warrior river, sixty feet from the bank. Miss Hunter grasped Partin, who was not a good swimmer, and pulled him beneath the surface. McCann, who was near in another canoe with a young woman, dived and swam about five feet to Partin's canoe. His companion used a stick and slowly paddled to the bank for help. McCann swung the end of Partin's canoe between Partin and Miss Hunter, and they grasped it. McCann supported Miss Hunter by reaching over the canoe and grasping her arms. Partin seemed to be demoralized. He tried twice to climb up on the canoe, and each time it went beneath the surface. He disappeared after the second attempt and was drowned. After being in the water about fifteen minutes McCann and Miss Hunter were taken to the bank by a man who came to the rescue in a boat. They had drifted until they were 150 feet above the overflow of the dam, where the drop was twenty feet. McCann wanted to remain in the water and dive for Partin. Miss Hunter was unconscious, but she was revived.

Tried to Save Man In Well.

Fred G. Buskuhl of Friend, Ore., was awarded a bronze medal. Buskuhl, aged forty-one, a farmer, attempted to save Joseph I. Parke, aged fifty-eight, a farmer, from suffocation at Friend on Aug. 3, 1912. Parke was overcome by powder fumes in a well twenty-four feet deep. Buskuhl, who was somewhat weak from a recent operation, responded to the calls of Parke's helper and, against the helper's protest, insisted upon descending. He was lowered with his foot in a loop in the well rope, and, although dizzy from the fumes, he grasped Parke and called to be raised. When the windlass had been turned only a few times Buskuhl fell unconscious to the bottom. He was removed fifteen minutes later, but remained unconscious for two days and was disabled for more than five months. Parke died as he was taken from the well.

Austin Hall of Iva, S. C., was awarded a bronze medal. Hall, aged twenty-two, a farmer, saved Edward Harris, aged twenty-eight, a well digger, from suffocation at Iva on Aug. 9, 1910.

John P. Burn of Atlanta, Ga., was awarded a bronze medal. Burn, aged thirty-six, an engraver, saved Isaac Janke, aged three, from drowning on May 12, 1913. Isaac fell through the opening in the street curb into a chamber which gave entrance to the shaft of a sewer. From the chamber Isaac slid over into the shaft and fell to the bottom of the sewer, which was nineteen feet below the street level. Burn, who knew nothing about the sewer, entered, crawled over into the shaft and descended. He spread his feet and got a bearing on the bottom and sides of the sewer and followed the course of the water ten feet to where he found Isaac. He was not seriously injured.

Saved In the Atlantic.

William S. Turner of Seaside Park, N. J., was awarded a bronze medal. Turner saved George S. Lewis from drowning at Avalon, N. J., on Aug. 15, 1914. Lewis and Turner swam in the Atlantic ocean to a point 300 feet from shore, and then Lewis became distressed in deep water. Turner swam to Lewis and tried to push him shoreward, but Lewis turned and grasped him at the shoulders with both hands. Lewis pushed Turner beneath the surface, and then Turner shook himself free. Turner tried to swim toward shore with Lewis, but because of an undertow made no progress. Turner went beneath the surface once or twice more and called to persons on shore to come out with a buoy. Lewis was very weak. Turner left him and swam hard for a distance of about 125 feet and then waded to shore. He was frightened by Lewis' condition and was weak from his exertions, and his legs trembled as he waded. He ran 150 feet, got a buoy and returned to the water. He asked a man to go out for Lewis and explained that he was so tired that he did not know whether he could undertake the rescue or not. The man would not go. Persons on shore held the end of a rope that was attached to the buoy, and Turner hung the buoy on his back by means of a loop of rope. He waded 175 feet and swam 150 feet to Lewis, who was ready to collapse when Turner reached him. Lewis grasped a loop of rope on the buoy, and Turner held him with one arm while holding to the buoy with one hand. Both were pulled to shallow water and helped to shore. Lewis was semiconscious, and Turner was exhausted.

The widow of Arthur H. Pingree of Norwood, Mass., was awarded a bronze medal. Pingree, a clergyman, died attempting to save Helen L. Marston, aged fifteen, and Helen M. Perkins, aged fifteen, from drowning at Annisquam, Mass., on July 19. The two girls ventured out and became distressed at 135 feet. The man allowed Miss Marston to hold to his shoulder while he drew Miss Perkins to the surface. She seized him around the neck, causing him to sink, and all three were borne off by the current. Miss Marston remained at the surface by paddling and was later rescued. Miss Perkins was drowned. Pingree was recovered unconscious, but efforts to revive him were fruitless.

Heroic Attempt Fails.

The mother of Thomas McGrady of Fredonia, Kan., was given a bronze medal. McGrady died assisting in an attempt to save Robert M. Oliver and Edward J. Hetzel from drowning at Pittsburgh on Jan. 13, 1915. Oliver and Hetzel were rowing on the Monongahela river. Their boat was swept against the upper end of a fleet of anchored barges. McGrady, who had but one leg, and another man entered a yawl and rowed more than 700 feet to the scene. Oliver stepped into their boat and sat down. McGrady and his companion then rowed hard and reached a point thirty feet upstream from Hetzel. They lost control of the boat, and the current then swept it broadside against the barges. All three men were drowned.

The father of William F. Niehaus, Jr., deceased, of Evansville, Ind., was awarded a bronze medal. Niehaus died assisting in the attempt to save Robert M. Oliver and Edward J. Hetzel. Niehaus accompanied McGrady to the rescue and lost his life.

The widow of Horace M. Parham of Austell, Ga., was awarded a bronze medal and $40 a month for support during her life or until she remarries. Parham, a farmer, died attempting to save Thomas Johnson from suffocation at Mableton, Ga., on Aug. 10, 1914. Johnson was overcome by noxious gases in a well thirty-five feet deep.

Henry H. Rogers of Austell, Ga., was awarded a bronze medal. Rogers saved Johnson in the accident in which Parham lost his life.

William Pratt of Austell, Ga., was also awarded a bronze medal for attempting to save Parham.

The widow of Andrew J. Atkinson of Vontay, Va., was awarded a bronze medal and $35 a month for support during her life or until she remarries, with $5 a month additional for her daughter until she reaches the age of sixteen. Atkinson died attempting to save William S. Johnson, aged twelve, from drowning at Gilmerton, Va., on Aug. 4, 1915.

The widow of C. Gilbert Danner of Fort Worth, Tex., was awarded a bronze medal and $30 a month for life or until she remarries. Danner died attempting to save Peter T. Skidmore from an electric shock at Fort Worth, Tex., June 6, 1915.

The father of Melvin Hagen, deceased, of Canby, Ore., was awarded a silver medal. Hagen, aged eighteen, died attempting to save Alma E. Summerfield, aged sixteen, from being run over by a train at Canby, Ore., on Jan. 7, 1914.

Harold W. Snow of Chicago was awarded a silver medal. Snow attempted to save Mollie Meredith, aged seventy-three, from being killed by a train at Jackson, Miss., on April 20, 1912.

The father of F. Lawrence Bryne, deceased, of Philadelphia, was awarded a silver medal. Bryne, aged eleven, schoolboy, died attempting to save William S. Ward, aged twelve, from drowning on May 21, 1915.

The widow of William D. Bard, Sr., of Little Rock, Ark., was awarded a silver medal and $35 a month for support during her life or until she remarries, with $5 a month additional for each of three children until each reaches the age of sixteen. Bard, an aged wire chief, died attempting to save Elsie Busick, aged sixteen, from drowning at Benton, Ark., on July 11, 1915.

CORFU SEIZED WHILE ASLEEP

Troops, Animals and Supplies Landed From Warships in Night.

Not a transport was used in the surprise landing of the French on the island of Corfu. Every man, gun, mule, horse, round of ammunition and pound of forage was embarked on French cruisers, which, convoyed by a flotilla of destroyers, left an unnamed port on Jan. 9.

Steaming at nineteen knots they sighted Corfu on the night of Jan. 10. With lights out they crept up the narrow channel between Corfu and the mainland, which had been infested by U boats, and entered Corfu harbor at 2 o'clock in the morning.

Such is the account from the Daily Chronicle's special correspondent at Corfu, who says that the troops were unloaded from four cruisers and rowed ashore while the town slept. The Italian and French consuls acted as guides to a hotel where an alleged German spy was arrested. Only just before the landing did the consuls officially inform the prefect of the disembarkation. The landing of the men and munitions took only five hours.

Retained Them Only by the Grace of the British Navy.

When Captain von Papen, the recalled German military attache at Washington, was held up at Falmouth he produced the safe conduct which had been given to him by the British government at the request of the United States state department and demanded that he be allowed to proceed unmolested.

The former attache was politely informed that the safe conduct only concerned his body and that the fact that he was allowed to retain his clothes was entirely an act of grace of the British navy. At that Captain von Papen used very uncomplimentary language in English, the British report said, and surrendered with bad grace the documents he carried.

GOT A COLD?

How to Ward Off This Common Winter Pest.

AN OUNCE OF PREVENTION.

Some Hygiene Notes on the Care of Young Children That Will Spare Them the Oftentimes Serious Setback of Cold Weather Influenzas.

At this time of the year colds are to be reckoned with. Especially is this true as applied to young folks, for once winter weather sets in the tiny tots are subject to a great many cases of "sniffles."

With them prevention is a thousand times better than cure. For this reason it should be the aim of every mother to keep colds out of the nursery rather than treat them.

First and foremost in such precautions comes undoubtedly the general pitch of physical fitness in which the child is kept. Most persons realize nowadays that infectious germs—and the common cold has undoubtedly its origin in one—depend on playing their wicked will upon the weakness or insufficiency of the white cells in the blood, whose business it is to fall upon and kill the enemy directly it gains entrance to the body. As long as the system is provided with an adequate number of these defenders in full vitality the invading germ will have such short shrift that no harm will follow its successful entrance or the fight will be waged so quickly that only the slightest inconvenience will ensue.

It follows, therefore, that it is doubly important to take all needful steps to keep children's physical condition up to the mark where there is any unusual tendency to infection. And January is undoubtedly one such time where colds are concerned.

This means that special care should be paid to all the small matters on which good health depends—a sufficiency of nourishing food, fresh air, both indoors and out, suitable clothing and—a very important point where school children are concerned—the proper amount of rest.

All this is the reverse of the coddling process, which defeats its own ends almost more certainly where colds are concerned than with anything else. Shutting children up indoors on all but the most propitious days, keeping them in overheated rooms, overloading them with thick clothes by day and heavy blankets at night—all these form a straight path toward mischief. At the same time the process of what is known as "hardening" children should be followed with only the greatest care.

There is a perversity about human nature which is very fond of running to extremes, and, although the coddling of babies and little children cannot be too strongly deprecated, at the same time it must be remembered that they are delicate little organisms, not attuned to the rough and tumble of life, and so demanding protection from its ruder elements, at any rate until they have lived long enough to have learned the power of combating adverse conditions.

It is not "hardening," but simply foolish to let a child go out on cold days with very little on at all, to dress it in extremely abbreviated garments, leaving the little legs and lower limbs exposed to cold and damp. The present fashion has something to answer for in this respect, for it is essential to nerve force that legs and the lower regions of the body should be kept warm.

IT WAS A BIG ORDER.

But He Caught His Breath In Time to Save the Situation.

That familiar things have different names in different countries was discovered by an Englishman while he was visiting the United States. Thus he tells the story of the watermelons:

I was eating dinner in an eastern city and saw on the menu, "Watermelon." We have watermelons in England, but they are what you in America call "muskmelons." Therefore I called the waiter and said, "Bring me two watermelons."

The dusky waiter's eyes grew large, and he protested:

"But, sah, you don't want two watamelons!"

I am not accustomed to have waiters tell me what I want. I knew perfectly well what I wanted. I saw some people at the next table smile at each other, and I was vexed. Therefore I replied to the waiter with much dignity:

"I GAVE MY ORDER."

"I want two watermelons."

The waiter seemed about to protest again, but I gave him a cold, steely look, and he thought better of it and went away. While he was gone I looked round and found every one within hearing distance smiling curiously. Looking further, I saw another waiter setting down before another man a plate containing an immense round of something green outside and bright red within. Then I spied my own waiter returning, bearing on each uplifted palm an immense green oval. No wonder the people smiled! The smile was about to become a laugh. I thought I should die! Then an idea came to me! When the waiter reached my place I looked at his burden quite judicially, tapped each of those elephantine "watermelons," and then I gave my order in a calm, decided tone:

"Bring me a slice from this one."—Youth's Companion.

Life's Battle.

He who is silent is forgotten; he who stops is overwhelmed, distanced, crushed; he who ceases to grow greater becomes smaller; he who leaves off gives up.—Henri Frederic Amiel.

Can't Please Everybody.

The manager of an asbestos mill conceived a novel idea for his announcements. He had them printed on thin asbestos and inclosed in envelopes of the same material. As he was uncertain of the correct addresses of some of the stockholders, he ordered his stenographer to write on each envelope "Please Forward."

The idea was clever, but one may appreciate the feelings of the widow of one of the stockholders when she received an asbestos envelope addressed to her late husband with the inscription "Please Forward" beneath the address.

Too Suggestive.

A professor at Columbia said one day to a roomful of auditors:

"Chronological coherence in ideas is much to be desired, but there are times when it becomes too suggestive. For instance, I once heard a minister make the following announcement at one of his Sunday services:

"'The funeral of the late and much lamented sexton takes place on Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Thanksgiving services will be held in this chapel on Thursday morning at 11 o'clock.'"—Washington Post.

Military Economy.

A Confederate officer, serving under Jackson at second Manassas, was severely wounded in a charge. Just about that time the Confederate ammunition was running so low that the soldiers were meeting the Union charges with stones. The wounded officer lay on the field, and presently a surgeon and stretcher bearer found him. After an examination the surgeon commanded the bearers to carry the officer off to the ambulance.

"Easy, boys," he said, "the man's got three bullets in him."

The officer was just conscious enough to hear one of the bearers growl:

"Three bullets! Great Scott, don't put him in the ambulance; load him in the ammunition wagon!"—New York Post.

My Most Important Law Case

By JOHN Y. LARNED

My most important law case? If you mean the most important case to me individually, it was a case of breach of promise. It was a case where a woman sued a man for refusing to keep a contract of marriage and to settle on her at the same time $100,000. The strange feature was that the man, who was madly in love with the plaintiff, was as madly desirous to marry her, but claimed that he hadn't the $100,000 to give her.

My first interpretation of the case was that the woman was trying to bleed a man without having ever had any intention to marry him; my second was that she had a passion for getting men in love with her. Fitz Mooney, the defendant, in a written appeal for Kate Jackson, plaintiff, to marry him, had agreed to settle $100,000 on her if she would do so. He had at the time made twice that amount on the Stock Exchange, but had lost it all. For some reason that the lady kept to herself, knowing that he was unable to keep the financial part of his contract, she sued him on the agreement.

Kate Jackson was a widow, not especially good looking, but possessing a magnetism over men that enabled her to do what she pleased with them. She came into my office a stranger to me, offered me her case, and I was convinced from the first that she was simply desirous of annoying Mr. Fitz Mooney, though what was her object in doing so I could not imagine. There was nothing to be got out of him, and I convinced her of the fact—if she was not convinced already—but she insisted on proceeding with the case. Since I was then struggling to gain a practice and with poverty at the same time, I consented; but not before the lady had paid me $100 retaining fee.

I was soon sorry that I had accepted it. I had spent it. I was unable to get rid of my client by returning it. Never have I had such an annoying case. Mrs. Jackson did not give me her confidence, and I was continuously in doubt as to what she was driving at. Instead of my managing the case for her she was managing the plaintiff through me. Her ground of action was that she had declined several offers of rich men to accept the defendant, that he had won her affections, her other suitors had been married, died, disappeared or failed to propose again. She had thus been deprived of a pick of several fortunes. She proved these assertions by showing me love letters from these parties, and on inquiry I learned that they were rich men. What I did not learn was that they were not still available as husbands.

Half a dozen times I had the case ready to be tried, and every time something occurred to cause delay. Once the plaintiff, who was always speculating, having made $50,000 in wheat, offered to settle it all on her and marry her as well if she would accept the compromise. She peremptorily declined. The money was soon lost in copper, and my client to my surprise seemed suddenly mortified and showed signs of dropping the suit. I foolishly showed her a letter from the defendant, who was getting worn out as I was with the case, upbraiding her, whereupon she turned square about and demanded the whole amount for which she had sued, asking me if she could not double the claim.

Meanwhile my bills for services and costs were growing. The widow paid my bills promptly, but the costs went on accumulating. I reminded her that she would probably lose in the end, getting, if anything, a nominal award and would have to pay the court as well as my professional fees. But this did not stagger her in the least. The summer was coming on, and she went into the country, whence reports came that she had enthralled every man who came near her. I was in hopes that she would be snared herself and drop her case against Fitz Mooney. No such good luck. The last week in August she wrote me that she would return immediately after Labor day and desired that I would be ready to bring her suit to trial as soon thereafter as possible.

But when she returned a change had come for Fitz Mooney. He had sunk a lot of money in cotton, and on winding up his deals the account showed that he owed his broker $75,000. This was not all. His troubles, largely his affairs with the widow, had broken down his health, and he was lying very ill in a hospital.

Such was his condition when the plaintiff sailed in to my office and asked me if I was ready to try his case. I replied by giving her a brief account of Fitz Mooney's misfortunes, adding that I feared he would die before we could get judgment.

"Oh, my goodness gracious!" was the response.

Never have I seen a more sudden collapse. She begged me to call a cab at once, and when it came, apparently oblivious of me, she ran down to it and drove to the hospital.

That is the last I saw of her till after Fitz Mooney had recovered and I attended the wedding. I have seen much of the perversities of the fair sex, but nothing like this. I learned later on that the couple had been engaged and had had a spat occasioned by a criticism of Fitz Mooney of his fiancee's accepting an attention from another man. Out of this grew the whole trouble.

CRANBERRIES.

Our Government Tells How to Candy Them.

QUITE LIKE CANDIED CHERRIES

An Inexpensive Confection, Delicious and Seasonable—An Expert Recipe to Make Tutti Frutti Ice Cream From Bits of Glace Fruits and Berries.

[Prepared by United States department of agriculture.]

The secret of candying cranberries lies in handling the fruit so that it will become saturated with sugar. This calls for slow cooking on the installment plan and the use of a dish large enough to permit all the berries to float at the top of the sirup during cooking. The skins are so tough that they must be pierced before cooking to let the sirup into the pulp or interior. To do this three little slits, each one-eighth inch long, should be made in each berry with the point of a penknife. Use selected large, firm cranberries. The directions for cooking are as follows:

For one and one-half cupfuls of berries make a thin sirup by boiling together until clear two cupfuls of sugar and two and one-half cupfuls of water. When the sirup is cool add the berries and bring very slowly to the boiling point. If the berries are heated too quickly the skins will burst before the sirup soaks into the pulp. As soon as the sirup boils take the dish off the stove and let it stand overnight. Next day drain the sirup from the berries and boil it until it is reduced to about half its original volume. Put the berries into this medium thick sirup and heat slowly, boil gently for three or four minutes, and then allow to stand for two hours or more. Then boil gently a third time for five minutes. A smaller dish probably will be needed for the third and last boiling. When thoroughly cold, or, better still, on the following day, drain off the sirup and spread the berries out on a lightly buttered plate or a sheet of clean, waxed or lightly buttered paper until the surface of the berries dries.

The berries, if directions have been followed, will candy separately and not in a sticky mass.

To make a delicious ice cream add one-half to three-quarters of a cupful of chopped berries to each quart of the cream mixture. They also can be combined with bits of candied orange or lemon peel or other glace fruits to make tutti frutti ice cream. The sirup left over after the berries are candied has a pleasant, sweet acid flavor and fine color and is excellent in pudding sauce or even, when diluted with water, for use on pancakes and waffles.

Unbleached Muslin Spread.

Every woman likes to own a hand-made spread, but the majority of spreads call for such expensive materials that few women can afford to indulge in the luxury. However, here is a spread which is within almost every woman's reach. It can be duplicated for about $[illegible]. The spread is made of unbleached muslin. All over its surface conventional scrolls are outlined by means of huge French knots. On the spread in question white knots are used, but there is no reason why one could not use colored cotton to carry out the color scheme employed in one's bedroom. The edge of the spread is finished with cotton fringe.

In place of a quilting party why not have a spread party? The work will then be quickly and pleasantly done.

A Kitchen Hint.

Keep a piece of pumice stone in the kitchen to clean the irons with. It will instantly remove those particles of starch that adhere to the iron and will also remove rust or dirt. A careful rubbing with pumice before you put the irons on the heat will prevent any possibility of dirty marks on the delicate linens or laces.

A Charming Senorita

Designed by J. M. Gidding, New York.

SPANISH fashion tendencies have been introduced for several months, especially in fancy dance frocks, and the gown here pictured also shows a little of the Spanish art. This tulle constructed model is an appropriate fashion for the slender woman. The main design of full skirt and tight fitting waist is still maintained and will continue in vogue for some time. The extremely wide skirt is trimmed with several bands of silver ribbon, and with this type of skirt is offered an oddly draped waist made basque style. The waist is of draped silk, which matches the bands on the skirt. The bodice is sleeveless and is held up by garlands of flowers.

The odd headdress of tulle is wound oriental fashion about the head and throat.

For Little Brother.

For the little man of fashion this suit of pongee silk is both serviceable and stylish. It is suited to development in other materials, however.

The pride with which little brother wears this suit will be quite pardonable when it is known that it is carried out in pongee silk. It is equally well suited to development in velvet, velveteen, serge or linen. Two pieces comprise the suit—a blouse and side closing trousers. The blouse is made with a round collar and long one-piece sleeves pleated at the lower edge.

For four-year size the suit requires 2¼ yards 36-inch material.

There are quite a number of pieces to the pattern, so that particular care is required in the cutting of the suit. First fold the material in half. On the lengthwise fold first place the back, which, by the waist, is the only section of the pattern so arranged. Going back to the left, lay the lap on a lengthwise thread and place the front of the blouse above it, with the front of the trousers to the right, both on a lengthwise thread. To the right of the back of the blouse the collar is laid, and to the right of this comes the back of the trousers. Next follow the sleeve and cuffs, while the two belt sections, "G" and "H" are laid near the selvage edge opposite the back of the trousers. If a short sleeve is desired, cut off lower part of the sleeve on small "o" perforations.

Silk buttons are used to trim the suit if it is made of velvet, but when fashioned of pongee, self-material or braid would be in better taste.

FOR YOUR BOYS.

Instructions How to Make Bobsleds For January.

Again snow brings opportunities for sport, and in every hilly section or in places where long, even slopes occur the old time, never stale, forever delightful art and glory of coasting will be followed and encouraged.

The various fliers, coasters, gutter jumpers, stomach bumpers (often less elegant terms are used), are all laws unto themselves, and their riders, who, in various attitudes, go singly or perhaps with a passenger, lickity split down the icy grades, frequently find them uncertain steeds at the turns. Even the biggest bobsleds, when built too high and with inefficient steering apparatus, are unequal to the curves and may prove unsteady craft at all times where the passengers are erratic or the course is uneven.

As with the safest and best racing automobiles and pushmobiles, the most successful bobsled or double runner is built low and not too narrow. By the dimensions given below it will be seen that the height of the runner and the thickness of bolster and board make up the distance from the surface of the snow to the seat, and this should not be greater than ten and a half or eleven inches. The board may be any length desired up to twelve feet, this carrying an average of seven passengers sitting very close and allowing, of course, for the steersman's legs. An eight foot board is better and four or five passengers a safer and saner limit.

A bobsled may be constructed throughout, runners and all, or it may be successfully built upon two bought sleds, if they are very strongly made and braced, the material being oak, ash or elm.

The method of uniting these two sleds is not difficult. The board should be of the best material, ash, oak or elm, though hard yellow pine may serve. It should be mill planed from an inch thick or from 1¼ inches if longer than eight feet. The width is eleven or twelve inches. Make top and all corners, edges and ends round and smooth with coarse sandpaper.

Sausage a la Rheims.

To prepare this dish take half a pound of sausages, two cupfuls of mashed potatoes, seasoning, milk or gravy, two tablespoonfuls of bread crumbs. Blanch the sausages by putting them into a saucepan with cold water and bring them quickly to the boil. Then drain them, remove the skins and cut them into two or four pieces, according to size. Place these in a greased pie dish or fireproof dish and sprinkle them with pepper and salt. Then take about two cupfuls of nicely washed potatoes, seasoned and moistened with a little milk or gravy, and spread on the top of the sausages. Brush over with milk or egg, sprinkle with breadcrumbs and bake in a good oven twenty or thirty minutes.

Gnats' Eggs.

The gnat fashions its eggs in the shape of a lifeboat. You cannot sink them without tearing them to pieces.

ROAST TURKEY.

Directions For Preparing the Seasonable Bird, Home Style.

A ten pound turkey is a good size for any but the smallest family. Burn off the hairs and use a brush for washing outside. Wash inside with cold salted water. Stuff, truss and place on its side on a rack in the baking pan after rubbing entire surface with salt and black pepper; also rub breast, wings and legs with a little butter mixed in flour, the two blended together until creamy. Dredge bottom of pan with a little flour, adding half a cupful of cold water to this. Put in hot oven, and when flour on the surface begins to brown reduce heat, basting every fifteen minutes with fat in pan. If this cooks away add boiling water as needed. During the cooking turn the turkey so it may brown evenly. If it cooks too fast cover with buttered paper to prevent scorching of the skin. It must be basted frequently and thoroughly to be juicy. Remove the string and skewers before serving and garnish with celery tips and rings and disks of carrots, boiled and strung on a fine wire.

A plain filling is made with dry stale breadcrumbs mixed with a tablespoonful of minced onion, the same of butter, and salt and black pepper to taste. Drop the butter in tiny nuts through the filling, letting the two blend as they will. This produces a "dry" filling.

"An Apple a Day."

FRIED BACON AND APPLES.—Place bacon on rack in dripping pan. Dripping pan should have enough water to cover bottom. Place in hot oven, cook until bacon is brown and crisp. Slice cored, unpared apples. Heat bacon drippings in pan, lay in the apples, sprinkle with sugar, cook in the oven until brown. Serve bacon on platter surrounded with apples.

Apple Shortcake.—To two cupfuls of flour are added one-half teaspoonful of salt, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one tablespoonful of sugar and one-half cupful of shortening. Mix as for baking powder biscuits. Fill pie plate with sliced apples and cover with the crust. Bake until apples are tender and crust is thoroughly baked. Turn on plate, dot with butter, sprinkle with sugar and cinnamon. Serve with or without cream.

Apple Sauce Cake.—Mix one cupful of apple sauce, unsweetened, with one cupful of sugar, one-half cupful of shortening, one teaspoonful of cinnamon, one-half teaspoonful of cloves, one-eighth of a teaspoonful of salt, one cupful of raisins, one teaspoonful of soda and two and one-half cupfuls or more of flour. Stir and bake a light brown.

Steamed Apples.—Pare and partly core apples. Do not remove the blossom end. Place apples in steamer and fill with butter, sugar and cinnamon or sugar, cinnamon and lemon or candied ginger. Serve with meringue or whipped cream.

Apple Charlotte.—Six large tart apples, one-half cupful of sugar, one-half box of gelatin, one cupful of cold water, one pint of cream.

Pare and strain the apples, then press through a colander and add sugar to them while hot. Add the gelatin, which has soaked for one-half hour in the cold water, and stir until dissolved. Stand in a pan of ice water and stir continually until the mixture begins to thicken; then fold in the cream, which has been beaten to a stiff froth. Turn into a pudding mold and serve when very cold.

A Cabin From a Redwood Log.

There is a cabin in Golden Gate park, San Francisco, which is constructed of a single log of redwood. It is about twelve feet long and rests upon a heavy platform of timbers which support the weight of the hollowed log. A doorway about five feet high and eighteen inches wide admits visitors to the interior, which forms a fair sized room. The appearance of the cabin is striking because the front presents a cross section of a large redwood tree with the bark intact.—Popular Science Monthly.

CLERK ALLEN FINDS RECORD

Paper Contains Names of Fire Laddies of Fulton in 1845.

The finding of an old document this morning at City Hall is of an interesting nature in that it contains the names of the firemen who served in Engine company, No. 1, City of Fulton in 1845. City Clerk Allen uncovered this interesting bit of paper during a clearing-up process in his office.

T. V. Wortman, whose signature is affixed to the list was evidently the penman and his handwriting is distinctly that of the old school. The names in order are: William Sipson, Jno. C. Hirighter, G. W. Bryant, Samuel Hart, G. H. Patterson, Willard Johnson, O. F. Allen, H. N. Sabin, C. M. Cooper, J. H. Whitaker, L. R. Kenyon, S. S. Wing, O. Cheeney, A. R. Stevens, R. H. Kelty, D. Cornell, C. J. Degraw, G. W. Woodin, T. V. Wortman, R. Fullerton, Chas. Higriter, Chas. Robinson, W. B. Mead, A. D. Stowell, and A. Smith. The first named member was the foreman of the company, this being attested to in a certification opposite the secretary's signature.

On August 23rd, 1838, according to note on the back the following letter was received by "R. H. Tyler, Esq." Clerk of Fulton Village from William Pratt & Company, fire engine dealers, Waterford, Aug. 20, 1838.

Mr. R. H. Tyler:

Sir: Your letter dated the 9th inst., containing inquiries respecting Fire Engine, is before us. We have to say in reply that we can furnish one of our largest at very short notice; probably in two weeks after the reception of an order. We can furnish, either plain painted, or ornamented to the amount of from fifty or one hundred dollars. In regard to the terms of payment we have to state that we sell only for cash, or approved notes with interest. We should be very happy to sell you an Engine and we will say that if you order one and it does not fully answer the recommendations in every respect, if desired we will take it awaywithout charge.

Respectfully yours,
William Platt & Company.

While the folded paper on which the letter was written evidently represented the standard business stationary of that time, a printed description of the company's product is displayed on the inner page. In describing their engine, they stipulate one designed for 24 men, one for 18 men, etc.,from which it is evident that the power was furnished by hand, therefore the large membership in the village fire fighting force. Certifications are attached from the New York and Buffalo fire departments to the effect that the firm's engines were being used in these cities and that they were to be highly recommended.

BOARD MEETS THIS EVENING

The application of J. J. McGinnis for a deed to a portion of West 1st st., upon which he desires to build a modern brick structure on the site of the burned Hotel Royal, will be acted upon tonight at a meeting of the Board of Public Works.

The board will also give its decision regarding the extension of the time for the completion of the contract awarded the Fulton Light, Heat and Power company for street lighting. City Attorney Hillick has advised that no extension would be granted until a thorough perusal of the original contract wasm ade. He has assured former City Attorney Fanning that the issue would be definitely decided tonight.

Mayor Lewis stated today that he had heard of a petition being circulated to prevent the construction of a building by the Fulton French Cleaning & Dyeing company, but that no complaint has reached him. Property owners in the vicinity of the proposed new building oppose the construction on the ground that it will increase insurance rates

NO STARVATION IN GERMANY IS SEEN

Merely Thought of Hunger Has Produced Existing Outcry.

NEVER WANT FOR ANY FOOD

German Stomach, Accustomed to an Overabundance, Is Being Improved by the Regulations—Prices Have Been Only Slightly Advanced—Eating About 15 Per Cent Less.

The German stomach is an imperious organ, very jealous of its economic rights, very touchy, accustomed to be overnourished. To trifle with its habits entails perilous political consequences. For many years it has carried on a winning feud with those who speculate in its needs for private gain. And now it hates England and clamors for the vengeance of heaven not on account of anything it has suffered, which, according to German scientists, is no more than was good for it, but because England threatened to starve it. Really it has never been hungry since the war began. If its condition had been at any time so uncomfortable as the world supposed it to be the war had then been ended, says a Berlin correspondent of the New York Times.

There is no scarcity of food in Germany actually. That is to say, there now is and has been always plenty to eat. There has been only too little of this or that, made up for by more than enough of something else. A deficit of grain is offset by an abundance of potatoes, a deficit of meat by an increased supply of fish, a deficit of fat by an abundance of honey, and so on. And as the war has now gone through two harvests, as conditions tend rather to improve than to become worse and as the surplus food production of Roumania, Bulgaria and Turkey now is added to the resources of Germany and Austria-Hungary, it is not easy to imagine how the German people are going to be starved. They are eating, statistically, perhaps 15 per cent less than they normally would and yet, perhaps, 10 per cent more than they need to eat. The case is somewhat better than the statistical statement would imply, since, owing to rigid methods of regulation, much waste of distribution is eliminated. A country that has normally produced only 85 per cent of its own food, suddenly cut off from its outside supplies, must be supposed to have a deficit of 15 per cent, but where formerly was waste and now is none the people will be able to consume 85 per cent of the normal amount plus the former waste, which now they also eat. That alone is a considerable factor, though it cannot be statistically expressed.

Meeting Kriegsbrot.

On entering Germany for the first time since the war began one has certain disagreeable expectations. One feels the weight of much beautiful white Dutch bread consumed in Holland, camel fashion. Here are 65,000,000 people living on diminished rations. One is prepared to see their stomachs through their eyes and to be regarded oneself with envy as a well-fed visitor from the outside world, where there is everything to eat. It is true that the color, texture and quality of bread change abruptly. At the frontier station is "kriegsbrot" (war bread), brown, sliced very thin and a little soggy. On the walls are posters reminding travelers of their obligation to eat moderately in wartime. But the cutlet is very good, the gravy rich, the potatoes delicious, the coffee only Prussian, and the cost is altogether 2 marks and 60 pfennigs—that is, about 75 cents. This is really not so bad, and on second scrutiny the people look not in the least undernourished. On the railway station counter are cakes and things like pies and ham and cheese and sausage sandwiches. On the speisewagen, proceeding toward Berlin, the bread is lighter, in the form of rolls; there is anything one wants to eat, including butter, and one begins to part with one's recollections of the last meal in Holland. At the hotel the next morning one receives with breakfast his daily bread card, but here the bread is really very good. It is a meatless day, the waiter tells you. For lunch there is sole and other fish, with plenty of potatoes and dainty things in sauce; but, of course, this is luxurious living. For dinner one goes to a popular restaurant to see what a meatless day is really like. There one has poached eggs, fried potatoes, string beans in sauce, and herring, with coffee and very palatable bread, for about 60 cents.

"Living," says the pro-German American resident, "is still cheaper in Berlin than New York, although prices have gone up about 30 per cent on the average. Here, for example," pointing it out on the bill of fare, "is a dish at 1 mark and 30 pfennigs that was formerly 1 mark; another at 1 mark 60 pfennigs that was 1 mark 20 pfennigs before, and so on down the list. Beer and wine have not gone up at all."

Coins Words to Describe Wife.

Two brand new words were introduced by a young husband in a police court in Baltimore to describe his wife's attitude toward him, and, though they are not in the dictionaries, the magistrate declared they were eloquent. One is "growlsome" and the other "fussified."

WOULD TAX ALL OUR EXPATRIATES

Kenyon Introduces Measure Proposing Big Increase.

MIGHT REACH 30 PER CENT.

All Property They Own In America Would Be Made to Pay Heavily. Tax on Dowers to American Girls Who Marry Foreigners Is Included In the Measure.

A measure proposing a high graduated tax on the incomes of American expatriates derived from their American property has been introduced in the senate by Senator Kenyon of Iowa.

The Kenyon bill would place an annual tax of practically 30 per cent on the incomes of the wealthier expatriates. It also would make the dowers given to American girls who marry titled foreigners a source of considerable revenue to the United States government.

Under its provisions a normal tax of 3 per cent instead of the existing 1 per cent on American incomes would be levied on the incomes under $25,000 of all expatriates and foreigners derived from their investments in the United States.

Provides Supertax Too.

In addition a supertax would be levied as follows:

| | Per cent. |
|---|---|
| $25,000 to $50,000 | 4 |
| 50,000 to 75,000 | 6 |
| 75,000 to 100,000 | 8 |
| 100,000 to 200,000 | 12 |
| 200,000 to 400,000 | 16 |
| 400,000 to 500,000 | 20 |
| Over $500,000 | 25 |

Under the terms of the Kenyon law William Waldorf Astor, now Lord Astor of Hever, wealthiest of all American expatriates, would be compelled to pay to the United States government each year 28 per cent of his entire income derived from investments in this country.

At the present time Lord Astor pays only a tax of 7 per cent. It is estimated that the tax on the Astor fortune alone would net the government upward of $5,000,000 annually.

Affects Many Expatriates.

Other expatriated Americans who would pay a tax ranging from 11 to 28 per cent of their incomes derived from properties in this country would be:

Duchess of Roxburghe, daughter of Ogden Goelet.

Mrs. William B. Leeds.

The Ladies Curzon, granddaughters of the late Levi Z. Leiter of Chicago.

Lady Beatty, wife of Admiral Beatty and daughter of the late Marshall Field of Chicago.

Countess of Craven, daughter of Bradley Martin.

Duchess of Marlborough, formerly Consuelo Vanderbilt.

Countess of Granard, daughter of Ogden Mills.

Duchess of Manchester, daughter of the late Eugene Zimmerman.

Viscountess Maidstone, daughter of Anthony J. Drexel.

Countess of Suffolk, daughter of the late Levi Z. Leiter.

Mrs. Lewis Harcourt, niece of J. P. Morgan.

Countess of Ancaster, formerly Eloise Breese.

Lady Waldstein.

Lady Cheylesmore, daughter of F. O. French of New York.

Princess Cantacuzene, Julia, granddaughter of General Grant.

Marchioness of Dufferin, Flora Davis of New York.

Princess Radziwill, Dorothy Deacon of Boston.

Mrs. Joseph Chamberlain, Mary Endicott of Massachusetts.

Princess Hatzfeldt, Clara Huntington of San Francisco.

Duchess of Croy, Nancy Leishman of New York.

Princess Colonna, Eva Mackay of New York.

Countess of Egmont, Kate Howell of South Carolina.

Lady Camoys, Mildred Sherman of New York.

Countess Szechenyi, Gladys Vanderbilt.

Baroness Ramsey, Frances Whitehouse of Chicago.

Henry James, the novelist, who recently took out British citizenship papers.

Lady Decies, daughter of George J. Gould.

Millions Given In Dowers.

The exact amount of property owned by the above is not known to any one in the United States. In the following table, however, the amount of the fortune controlled by the expatriated American girls at the time of marriage or given to them as dowers is set forth

|---|---|
| Lady Camoys (Mildred Sherman) | $12,000,000 |
| Mrs. Ralph Vivian (Mrs. Marshall O. Roberts) | 12,000,000 |
| Lady William Harcourt (Mrs. J. R. Ives) | 5,000,000 |

STILL A KING!

What?

CO-ORDINATION OF INTERESTS!

Once upon a time a venerable old owl was the chairman of the Bird Congress, as a fable runs, and there was a great commotion and much chattering.

At last a long-legged crane got up and offered a resolution, in effect, that the bird which could fly the highest should be made the King. Then all the birds flashed up into the sky, but one by one they tired and dropped down, except the eagle, who flew up higher than the others, and said: "I am King!"

But his reckoning was wrong, as a little wren popped up from the back of the eagle's head, where he had slipped in among the feathers for a free passage into the blue atmosphere, just like a regular little dead-head and he said: "Not a bit of it, Sir Eagle; I am above you and I am still King."

"Fulton First, Last and All the Time"

Without doubt Letchworth, in England, furnishes the best example of the informal type, since the purpose of the organizer was clear and up to the present more fully developed than elsewhere. Says the prospectus of the company, "The four main features of Letchworth may be summarized as follows: (1) the freehold of the town is held in the interest of the present and future community; (2) the maximum number of houses to the acre is twelve; (3) only one third of the estate is being developed as town, two-thirds are being retained as rural and park land; (4) the shareholders are entitled to five per cent, the surplus will go to the tenants and lessees in one form or another." Hampstead, on the outskirts of London, is an excellent example of the topographical plan, for there the housing and garden questions have been brought to a harmonious conclusion. The manufacturing village under company control is best illustrated by the instances of Port Sunlight and Bourneville in England; Alfredshof in Essen, Germany; Hopedale, Massachusetts; Gary, Indiana and LeClaire, Missouri.

The garden plans, however, require, certain racial conditions in the community. If there is considerable variety in the nationality of the population it is difficult indeed to work out a garden city plan. The purpose is to secure a combined city and town effect; to do this the gridiron system of lot arrangement has been given over entirely, and the number of houses limited to from ten to twenty to the acre. Twelve houses to the acre of building land provide gardens of the right size, and not too large to be worked by a laborer and his family.

These houses are carefully grouped so as to give a picturesque appearance. But these facts about the garden city are not the vital ones, for the whole emphasis in the town's development has been shifted from property to citizens. To secure the advantages of comfortable living at smaller costs with enlarged community and individual rights is the purpose of these new municipalities.

When the idea is fully realized the city is its own landlord and its own builder, utilizing the land for recreation and residence purposes while planning for playgrounds, beauty spots, and open areas for public buildings. The fundamental principles recognized are: (1) the purchase of low priced agricultural land before development takes place; (2) the permanent control of the area, including streets, parks, and open spaces; (3) the utilization of the unearned increment due to the growth of the town for the benefit of the town, through either reduction in rent or the enlargement of municipal enterprises.

The types of the garden city may be grouped under the three heads of (1) the self-contained industrial community; (2) the garden suburb; and (3) the industrial village adjoining the factory plant.

All have in common the element of superior authority resting in the community organization. In Germany, where the greatest advances have been made in planning cities along distinctly topographical lines, a marked opposition has sprung up to what is called the "handsome picture" type of plan, which seeks to arrange symmetrically the appearance of buildings. This is effected mainly upon paper, though in actual construction it fails to make the impression that is expected when first planned. The point of view of this new group of men in Germany is the avoidment according to topographical conditions. Looked at it this way no two communities would have the same plan of development since the conditions upon which they were worked out would not be the same.

A somewhat rapid city man, according to a story that is going the rounds, remarked to a farmer friend: "Thursday we autoed to the country club, and golfed until dark, then trolleyed back to town and danced till morning." The farmer "got back" in this language: "I've been havin' some time myself. Wednesday I muled to the cornfield and geehawed 'til sundown. Then I suppered till dark and piped till nine. Then I bedsteaded 'til five o'clock, then breakfasted 'til it was time to go mulin' again."

DIX FIRE LOSS PLACED AT $3000; PROPERTY TO BE MADE OVER LIKE NEW

Damage estimated at $3,000 was done to the millinery stock and house furnishings by the fire which visited the Dix store yesterday morning, according to a statement made today by Miss Trixie Dix. The damage is covered entirely by insurance. The building which was damaged to the extent of $500 is the Dix property, and Miss Dix states that all traces of the fire would be removed and the interior and exterior put into shape as soon as the insurance underwriters have made their adjustment.

That the fire did not spread to adjoining property, endangering the entire business section was due to the heavy water presure prevailing at the time. This is according to Superintendent of Public Works Rumsey's statement. The high water pressure, according to Mr. Rumsey, was due to the fact that the standpipe at the time of the fire was full. The operation of the pump at the water works was suspended.

An item which should have immediate adjustment, Mr. Rumsey advised, is the assessment of factory owners for the maintenance of water pressure to sustain the automatic sprinkling systems in operation in the various plants.

The Hunter Arms company pays $70 yearly for this privilege, and the rate varies in each instance, when it should not, as the city is not put to any expense furnishing the needed water pressure. The manufacture, also, by reason of this service, is paying a lower insurance rate. A uniform rate for all was Mr. Rumsey's opinion.

LONDON PAPER HURLS DEFIANCE AT AMERICA IN BLOCKADE ISSUE

London.—The Morning Post, which since the beginning of the war, has been attacking theg overnment, this morning features a despatch from its Washington correspondent which declares that because exports of cottonseed oil, a purely American product, to Holland and Scandinavia increased from 48,000,000 pounds in 1913 to 117,000,000 in 1915 the British fleet's blockade of Germany is a farce.

The correspondent, who makes scant allowance for the fact that the increases probably are due to Russian imports through Scandinavia, also makes the dangerous charge that prices of foodstuffs in America are being raised against England. Were it not for the fact that the people here give scant attention to the moribund moanings of this newspaper, which always has been rabidly anti-American in tone, its articles and editorials might promote trouble.

In addition the Morning Post publishes a letter from Admiral Lord Charles Beresford protesting against the agreement of the government to honor United States passports borne by German-Americans, and another from Bart Kennedy, Bohemian journalist, and actor, who says that as he discovered during eleven years' residence in the United States Americans disliked Englishmen, the government should not try to conciliate America.

There is no doubt here that theb lockade will be made much more rigid, and if friction with the United States becomes acute it will be due to newspapers like the Morning Post, which, begrudging the expenditure of British money in America, has done everything since the war began to oppose the government's policy of protecting interests and of strengthening friendships with neutral nations.

BLAZE IN CHIMNEY CALLED DEPARTMENT

The Fire Department late yesterday afternoon was called to the home of Harry Yarwood, in one of the Woolen Company's West First st. houses to extinguish a blaze caused by an over heated chimney. The fire was quickly extinguished. Only a small damage resulted.

MARKET COMMITTEE MET THIS AFTERNOON

The committees chosen by Mayor Lewis to look into the site of the proposed city market will meet this afternoon at 3:30. Their report will be submitted to the council at the adjourned meeting in the City Hall tonight.

LIGHTING CONTRACT VOID; McGINNIS GETS PROPERTY; NEW PARK NEEDS LIGHTS

The contract entered into between the city and the Fulton Heat, Light & Power company for the installation of the ornamental lighting system in downtown streets, was awarded by the Board of Public Works in December, 1915, is in-valid and cannot be recognized by the city as binding, according to City Attorney Hillick. For this reason the Board of Public Works refused last night to grant the application of the company for the extension of time to complete the work. Manager Jordan, of thel ighting company, was told that a friendly attitude would be maintained toward the company; that before the next meeting the City Engineer, City Attorney and a representative of his company will confer for the purpose of drawing up a new contract.

Believes in Brightening Corners

With the illuminating system entirely in place, there will be a total of 52 posts in the business section, Mr. Jordan stated. The lights being installed under the present contract will be turned off at 1 o'clock, while the remainder will burn all night. "You cannot dress up your town too much," Mr. Jordan advised. He pointed out the advantages of brightening the business section, citing the impression received by travelers passing through the city. He mentioned the fact that merchants on the north side of Oneida st., east of 2nd, desired to have three poles placed in front of their stores. After stating that certain business men had neglected to pay their share for the installation of the posts, while others had paid as much as $100, Mr. Jordan expressed his opinion that the entire length of 1st st., to Broadway, will be illuminated within a short time.

City Attorney Hillick's opinion of the contract is expressed thus: "The contract states in part that the lighting company is to be paid not more than $2,280 additional; it does not stipulate the cost of current for each individual light; and if an additional light, or lights, were to be installed in the future, there is no stipulation to denote the amount which the city would have to pay for the additional installation. The whole contract is unbusinesslike," Mr. Hillick continued, "and it would be the height of folly to undertake to do business with such an uncertain agreement." Mr. Hillick thereupon advised the board that any resolution passed at this time granting extension of time—or having any bearing on the terms of the original contract, might have a possible effect in case a dispute arose and for that reason suggested that no positive action be taken until the conference between himself, Mr. Hill and Mr. Jordan had taken place.

Board's Fiendly Attitude

Commissioner Allen informed Mr. Jordan that the board was inclined to be friendly to the lighting company and he also said, "You can rest assured Mr. Jordan, that petty politics is not being played. The board is acting in good faith towards you and knowing that the ornamental lighting system will prove of advantage of the city, no obstacles will be placed in the path of the undertaking." Mr. Jordan concluded the discussion by stating that he had written a letter to the former board designating $47.50 as the price for the lighting of each pole, which should have been included in the wording of the contract. He also wrote that there were to be five lights to the pole and gave the amount of candle power. Mr. Jordan said his company had always experienced difficulty with the Board of Public Works in previous administrations and that he believed the the present body would not emulate the example of former boards.

Although he is the owner of eight lots in Alderman Distin's ward, Commissioner Allen suggested to the board that the $900 available for sewer improvements be used in either Seward or Fremont sts., instead of financing the construction of the sewer which Alderman Distin requested at thefi rst meeting of the board. ### CONCERNING INVESTIGATIONS

Senator George F. Thompson, who investigated the Public Service Commission of New York, to good purpost, wants to keep it. The legislature demurs.

Senator Thompson is of pugnacious disposition. Having acquired the investigation habit and finding the Legislature out of sympathy with his uninterrupted exercise of it, he responds with his favorite weapon. District-Attorney Swann investigated his hotel bills, therefore he'll investigate Swann. Governor Whitman wants a recess in investigations, therefore he'll investigate Whitman's California trip.

The Legislature of the state is nominally in sesion. It has certain duties to perform important enough to deserve the individual attention of every member of it. The most confirmed investigator can find enough to keep him busy throughout the whole session in Albany. If the restless Mr. Thompson will stick to the job for which he was elected and will let his spirit of inquiry lead him into study of legislative methods he will keep occupied.

While the Legislature is in session the legislators should be at their desks. Eight months a year should be ample for senators with political ambitions to serve to go investigating.—Post-Standard.

JEWISH RELIEF DAY

To aid the Jews of Europe, victims of war's storm, a relief day has been set by decree of President Wilson. The day will be Thursday next. Watertown poins in the nation wide movement to help a suffering race in time of sore need.

Perhaps more than any other people in Europe the Jews have need of aid. Their lot previous to the war was a none too happy one, and with the war came added woes manifold. The story of Russia and Poland has been told many a time and the world knows the bitter tale of the Jews in these lands.

The Jews in Europe in time of peace, and as a peace loving people, have given of their best to the nations to whom they pay allegiance. In war the Jews are found in great numbers in the ranks of all armies. Now Jewish families, victims of the war, through either husbands or brothers sacrificed, or through the destruction of homes in war regions find themselves in dire need. This is especially true in Austria and in Russia.

In our own city a committee has been appointed among the members of the race, and on Thursday next they will endeavor to do their part toward aiding the national fund for the relief of their stricken brethren. This is as ituation where race does not count but stricken humanity calls and residents of the city will do a good deed in aiding such a movement.—Watertown Standard.

A BAD PRACTICE

Senator Thompson justifies the big bill of the Biltmore Hotel and its payment by the state, on the ground that the usual procedure has been followed and that it is customary to charge in theatre tickets and taxi fares and every other expense that a committee incurs and pro rate the account among the expense accounts of the individual members. Unfortunately this is true as a precedent. That has been the custom and the only reason a fuss is made about it this time is that certain members of the investigating committee objected to having charged to the state amounts which they had not incurred. It would appear that as they were charged with room and board and luxuries that they never had, then in the pro rata asessments some other members of the commission must have had a high old time with their bills charged to members who didn't have anything. At any rate it seems very ridiculous that a committee appointed to investigate the public service commission because of extravagances in the administration of its office should be itself guilty of a worse offense. Now the investigators are to be investigated and possibly that will bring in time an investigation of the investigators of the investigators with a never ending expense to the state. The fact is that a very bad practice has been exposed. This system of charging by wholesale of expenses and then pro rating the bill make the innocent suffer with the guilty. Senator Thompson probably didn't know anything about it, the sergeant-at-arms accompanying the committee being the bookkeeper and doing all the business. A simple following of the rules of the state comptroller's office, which requires individual responsibility, would have prevented all this scandal. Under those rules each member of the committee would have put in his individual bill to the comptroller for money actually expended, together with vouchers, and there would have been no committee bill except for rooms used for committee purposes, clerk hire, and so on. All others, except legislative committees traveling on state business, have always had to do this and it is a good rule. There would have been no scandal had it been followed in this case, and a good deal less expense charged to the state.—Watertown Times.

THE SAVINGS AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

The Evening Times has pointed out the desirability of this city having a savings and loan association, managed prudently and conducted by capable and reliable officers—the reader's neighbor and his neighbor's neighbor. It is the experience of hundreds of towns and cities in this country that money thus invested will bring much larger returns than is obtainable from other institutions.

It is not the wick of the lamp that makes the light, but it is the oil in the vessel of the lamp that feeds the wick to give out the brightness. So it is with the savings and loan association. The light must come from the men who officer the society. A gun to be effective on the battlefield must have a good man behind it, and good men to operate the ingenious and intricate machinery. The percentage of failures of savings and loan associations is comparatively small. It is only when a society is improperly and injudiciously conducted that it falls into the hands of a receiver; or, when the men behind the gun get a notion that stock must be made to mature within an arbitrarily short time, regardless of the earnings or profits made by the association.

Earnings in savings and loan associations economically and prudently conducted will not vary to any great extent. An authority on associations says it is possible for them to fix a time when stock may be safely redeemed. Experience teaches that the monthly payment of $5 on a $1000 certificate of running stock for a period of ten years and three months—amounting in all to $615—will earn during that period $385 and enable the association to make payment in full.

The satisfaction of having been helpful to a number of wage earners in securing homes of their own through the instrumentality of an association, is bound to afford some consolation and compensation to persons who believe in contributing something to the advancement of the common good. The almighty dollar is not the first and the last of our endeavor.

THE OLD MAN

By Robert J. Burdette

Ichabod, my boy, methought I heard you speak of your father this morning as "the old man." You are eighteen years of age, are you not?

Just so.

That is the age when callow youth has its first attack of bighead. You imagine at this moment that you know it all.

I observed by the cut of your trousers, the angle of your hat, the tip of your head, the flavor of your breath, the style of your toothpick shoes, and the swagger of your walk, that you are badly gone on yourself.

This is an error of youth which your uncle can overlook; but it pains him sorely to hear you speak in terms of disrespect of one you should never mention save by the sacred name, "father."

He may not be up to your style in the modern art of making a fool of himself, but ten to one he forgets more in a week than you will ever know.

He may not enjoy smoking gutter-snipes chopped fine and enclosed in delicate tissue-paper, but he has borne a good many hard knocks for your sake, and is entitled to all the reverence your shallow brain can muster.

By and by, after you are through knowing it all, and begin to learn something, you will be ashamed to look in the glass and wonder where the fool-killer kept himself when you were ripe for the sacrifice.

And then, when the "old man" grows tired of the journey and stops to rest, and you fold his hands across his bosom and take a last look at a face that has grown beautiful in death, you will feel a sting of regret that you ever spoke to him in so grossly disrespectful a manner; and when other sprouts of imbecility use the language that so delighted you in the germinal period of manhood, you will feel like chasing them with a thick stick and crushing their skulls to see if there is any brain-tissue on the inside.

Water Power Report May Be Smothered in Senate

Washington.—Gifford Pinchot, president of the National Conservation Association, has issued a statement in which he highly commends a recent report on water power made to the Senate by the Secretary of Agriculture, but says there is grave danger that "its publication will be held up until too late to affect legislation now before Congress," and that its revelations are "so damaging to the water power interests that serious effort will be made to smother it."

Mr. Pinchot says Secretary Houston's report "completely and finally disproves the one and only plausible argument of the water power grabbers" in that "they have everywhere asserted that the refusal to give them valuable public property forever and for nothing was discouraging capital and preventing development." He says that the Secretary's report shows that "a decent regard for the public interest does not hamper development," and that the very places where development has been most rapid is where the public interest has been most carefully protected. The statement in part says:

"The wisest and fairest regulation of the development and use of water power in the public interest is on the national forests by the Forest Service. Secretary Houston's report, the most searching and exhaustive ever made of the water power industry, shows that in 1915 nearly one half (forty two per cent) of the water power developed in the West is under Forest Service regulation. It is in the eleven Western States that this regulation has been and is now most extended and most effective.

"Reasanable regulation has not discouraged capital, for capital has invested. Nor has it checked development, for development was most rapid where government regulation was most effective.

"Most striking of all, the report shows that where the water power grabbers have complained most loudly about the retarding of development by the conservation movement—in Washington, Oregon and California—development has gone on until it is now actually in excess of market requirements.

"All this does not mean that the water power laws in force are ideal. They are not ideal, but they remain defective solely because the repeated efforts of the friends of conservation to get the defects remedied were defeated by the water power men and their friends, more particularly in the Senate. The latter have steadily insisted on handling over immensely valuable public water power properities without charge and without regulation, and when they could not do so they would let no bill pass."

FARMERS URGED TO ORDER HELP NOW

Rochester.—When the Wainwright legislative commission made its investigation a few years ago, resulting in the establishment of the law which created the State Employment Bureau, it found jobless men in the larger cities and manless jobs in the smaller communities. Employers in small towns reported that they were unable to obtain enough help to meet their requirements.

This was strikingly illustrated at the Rochester office of the employment bureau last week. A manufacturer in a nearby town informed the office that he had an opening in his factory for a stationary engineer as night watchman, and that he wanted a married man with a large family whose children could be employed in the factory, He said he had work for several entire families that could be done evenings.

POLITICAL COMMENT

An administration that settles claims against the state on a basis of less than three per cent is making good with the taxpayers.

If the Whitman administration had continued the Glynn policy of pushing one year's obligations forward into the next year, the Legislature this year would have had to levy a direct tax that would have been a source of great joy to its opponents.

Governor Whitman and Senator Sage are both from Missouri when it comes to propositions for spending public money. Following Governor Whitman's recommendation for the abandonment of certain state activities, Senator Sage has submitted for consideration a lengthy list of activities undertaken by the state in order to give the people an opportunity to determine whether or not they are worth what they are costing.

In a speech before the Y. M. C. A. of Gloversville, State Comptroller Travis pointed out that under the amendment to the inheritance tax law made in 1911, an estate that otherwise would have paid a tax of more than $2,000,000 to the state escaped taxation entirely, and declared that the law should be restored to its former condition to prevent this variety of tax dodging.

Charley Acts as Pro Tem. Mayor

A Song of the Sword

I am the sword;
Yea, babble of peace as ye will,
I am the master still.
For mine is the ultimate word.
When I speak naught else is heard.

Since ever the world began
I have been lord of man.
When the first anvil rang
'Twas of the sword it sang.
And the forge of Tubal roared
As he hammered the ruddy sword.

Scepter and orb and crown
At the flash of my wrath sing down.
While the bat spreads dusky wings
O'er the urns of mighty kings
That I broke and cast aside
And crushed in their pomp and pride.
For those I love I crown
And those I hate cast down.

Potent to slay or shield,
Lord of the stricken field,
Where flaunting pennons stream
And sparkling lances gleam,
Men come to be judged by me,
And I utter the last decree.
For I am the sword,
And, babble of peace as ye will,
I am the master still.

FARM TO TABLE PLAN GETS O. K. OF POSTOFFICE HEAD

Parcel Post Will Bring Housewife and Producer Together.

W. N. Collins, acting postmaster of Kansas City, Mo., has won recognition from Washington of his efforts to make the parcel post a farm to table servant. By special order of Postmaster General Burleson he has been given authority to become a clearing house between the farm and the city, bringing producer and consumer together.

In results it is perhaps the biggest thing the department has done since establishing the parcel post service, Mr. Collins believes.

Here is what it will do: The farmers, and especially those within the 150 mile zone of Kansas City, will write in giving a list of the produce they have to sell. This will be printed on a list issued at frequent intervals. The city housewife who asks for this list may have it mailed to her, and she may write direct to the producer to order. The carriers will distribute these lists to the homes if the voluntary demand does not prove sufficient.

Thus consumer and producer are introduced. If the producer wishes the product may be sent C. O. D. for an extra charge of 10 cents, and the postoffice department will collect and return the money.

"Few persons realize how cheaply they might have fresh vegetables, fruit, butter, eggs, meat, lard, sorghum and many other farm products direct from the farm," Mr. Collins said. "The carriage charges are very light. The rule is that within 150 miles the package is carried for just 4 cents more than the number of pounds. Thus a ten pound ham would be carried for 14 cents. The C. O. D. charge, which insures the sender, would be the uniform one of 10 cents, thus bringing the total ten pound cost up to 24 cents."

Mr. Collins will get a list of the farmers by bulletins sent to the country postoffices.

SAVING NEW YORK CITY'S CREDIT.

Banks Came to the Rescue and Insisted Upon the Adoption of the Pay-As-You-Go Policy.

CITY LOANS EXPENSIVE.

Interest Paid on Them Amounts to More Than the City Pays In State Taxes—City Officials Agree With Investigators.

New York, Jan. .—New York city owed $100,000,000 at the outbreak of the war in Europe with no possible means of providing for it unless some bank came forward.

The bankers of the city got together and financed a loan of $100,000,000 to relieve the city and protect its credit.

As a condition in making the loan, the bankers required the city to adopt the plan of reducing its floating debt by paying as it went, which plan became known as the pay-as-you-go policy. Twice within seven years the city has found itself in a position where it had to call upon the banks for assistance.

Prominent bankers have testified that a floating debt of $100,000,000 is too large and that some plan should be devised for taking care of it.

The policy of borrowing money in anticipation of taxes, it has been stated by bankers, is not, in principle, sound finance.

The interest paid on such loans in the last ten years has amounted to more than the city has had to pay in state taxes.

These facts have been brought out at the hearings of the joint committee of the Legislature that is investigating the financial condition of New York city with a view to devising some plan of relief.

There has been no disagreement between the committee and the city officials as to any of them.

The attitude of the committee toward the city has at all times been helpful rather than hostile and the city officials have given evidence of their appreciation of this attitude by their frankness in laying their troubles before the committee and claiming its assistance.

The testimony of leading bankers that the city has been carrying too large a floating debt has been accepted by the city officials without demur.

Already the city has adopted the pay-as-you-go policy which was insisted upon by the bankers at the time the $100,000,000 loan was made. This policy is now being carried out under a resolution of the Board of Estimate. It is likely to be established more firmly by being written into the law.

Two of the most important witnesses called by the committee thus far are Francis L. Hine, president of the First National Bank, and Henry P. Davison of J. P. Morgan & Co. Mr. Davison stated to Senator Brown, the chairman of the committee, that he did not want it to appear that J. P. Morgan & Co. were taking to themselves the credit of financing the city's loan of $100,000,000 in the summer of 1914 for the reason that all of the financial interests of the city of New York were associated in the interest of the city.

After he had described the financing of the loan, Mr. Davison was asked by Senator Brown to what he referred as wrong in financing the city. "Did you have in mind particularly," asked the senator, "the amount of short term paper on the market?"

Mr. Davison: "Not particularly except as it was brought to our minds by the crisis then presented. There was the city owing $100,000,000 with no possible means of providing for it unless some bank came forward. They were extended and were dependent upon the bankers for the solution of their problem. We thought that was unsound. It was a question of degree but that seemed to us to be serious; a floating debt of $100,000,000 we felt was much too large. Therefore we suggested that some plan be adopted and at the moment of our first suggestion we were met by the enthusiastic approval of the suggestion on the part of the city authorities. The Comptroller said that we could be no more concerned about that than he was."

Francis L. Hine, after testifying to the financing of the $100,000,000 loan, was asked by Chairman Brown:

"In your opinion, was it possible at that time for the city to have borrowed, of any small number of banks, the $100,000,000, including the $83,000,000 of gold?"

Mr. Hine: "In my judgment, it would have been impossible."

Senator Brown: "You felt that it would be a great national catastrophe if the credit of the city of New York broke down at that time?"

Mr. Hine: "We did."

In relation to the pay-as-you-go policy, Mr. Hine said the making of the loan was conditioned upon an agreement to adopt such a policy.

Senator Brown: "And you regarded action by the Board of Estimate as a part of their agreement in good faith as a condition of the loan?"

Mr. Hine: "We do."

When asked if he regarded the practice of making loans in anticipation of the collection of taxes sound, Mr. Hine testified: "I consider it unsound exercised in the degree in which it has been exercised."

PROMOTING PUBLIC HEALTH.

Spokane's Health Commissioner Is a Believer In Publicity.

In the public health work of Dr. J. B. Anderson, city health commissioner of Spokane, Wash., publicity is a most important factor, says the American City. Through the local press the people of the city are dealt with frankly and openly in every new undertaking of the health department.

Like all other successful health officials, Dr. Anderson is a vigorous enemy of the fly. "The fly is the death angel's commercial traveler," he said in one of his publicity tirades. "He has six legs and a dozen grips on each leg from which he retails his samples." At the Interstate fair, held in Spokane, he exhibited a large fly constructed to scale to illustrate preventable infant mortality. The fly's eyes blinked once every ten seconds, in accordance with this inscription placed above the model: "Death follows in my wake. Watch me blink. Every time I do a baby dies from a preventable cause. Observer! What are you doing to help prevent this drain on human resources?" A card placed between a cannon and the fly read: "We do not initiate. We transmit ruin and destruction." Just above this was a sign which said, "It is within the power of man to render us both harmless." A hemisphere hung at the back and was occupied by a skeleton engaged in driving the cannon and the fly, the purpose being to convey to the mind of the observer that these are two large instruments of destruction which could be overcome by a peaceful disposition on the one hand and cleanliness on the other.

THE CITY BEAUTIFUL

CITY TREES AS REWARDS OF MERIT.

Woman's Municipal League of New York City Makes Novel Suggestion.

"How many trees will your street earn?" says a pamphlet recently issued by the Woman's Municipal league of New York city, giving the report of the committee on streets and transit of the league. The report says:

"The committee on streets and transit has decided to take up one street in each district and try to make it a model street. A paid inspector, employed by the committee, has already begun on East Seventy-ninth street to visit the janitors in order to interest them in keeping their garbage cans covered, not to overfill the cans and to sweep their sidewalks. It has been suggested that the house keeping its walk the tidiest should receive a tree as a reward of merit—either a large tree planted permanently in front of the house or a small boxwood tree for the front door. We think that a street which has been beautified is likely to be kept more cleanly. The department of parks and the department of street cleaning are both very much interested in the scheme, and both wish to co-operate with us. The park department has no money to plant trees, and the league must therefore raise the money for this purpose."

SUCCESS OF HOME GARDENS.

International Child Welfare League Issues Statement on Its Work.

The International Child Welfare league has issued a statement showing what success it was able to achieve in its home garden movement for children last summer with the proceeds of a flower ball which it held last spring. The statement reads in part:

The International Child Welfare league, in conjunction with the bureau of education of Washington, has been studying the introduction of Commissioner P. P. Claxton's plan of the home garden under school supervision as a substitute for child labor. The experiment was tried in Westchester county, N. Y., last summer and has been so successful that the Welfare league is co-operating with all educational leagues in pushing the work.

The school garden and the home garden are often confused. The former is a community affair, with a teacher to oversee the whole plot. This plan is an excellent one for collective instruction and is recommended for children who have no home garden. The value of the home garden lies in the fact that the parents take more pride in the work of the child and with its economic results, which are more readily seen in the home than when the garden is at some distant point.

Tarrytown, N. Y., raised privately sufficient money, coupled with an amount contributed by the International Child Welfare league, to start the work with a teacher in the Washington Irving high school and also in the North Tarrytown high school. In this town the work was systematically organized under the Claxton plan, and its success has led to its adoption by the board of education as a part of the regular school work in the coming year.

The fact that the work is done after school hours and continued into the summer vacation period makes it easy to fit into the curriculum of any school, and the happy results in its bearing on health and morals make it a most valuable adjunct to school education.

BEAUTIFY GATUN LOCKS AND ALSO THE VILLAGE.

Zone Authorities Devoting Attention to Ornamenting Canal and Village.

The beautifying of Gatun locks and the village of Gatun has been started by the canal zone authorities. This is the first step in making any of the work of the canal assume its permanent aspect from an artistic viewpoint.

The first work is concerned with the removal of the superfluous trackage needed while the work of construction was in progress. It will be necessary to leave some of this, but it will be so rebuilt that it will not interfere with the beauty of the general effect. The track removal will give a wide and level lawn which will not be broken up either with buildings or flower beds.

Already all temporary structures needed for construction purposes have been removed and their former sites converted into lawns. The huge cranes and cableways that were used for conveying concrete from the mixers to the lock walls and floors are being removed. The lock walls have been cleared of all unnecessary material.

The village of Gatun, which will house the lock operating force and such military establishment as is needed to guard the locks, will be greatly beautified through the addition of many trees and ornamental shrubs. Additional roadways and pathways will be built. A new clubhouse is to be constructed, the old one being in such bad repair that it would not pay to repair it.

MODEL WORKMEN'S TOWN.

Goodyear Tract Has Been Included In the City of Akron.

So successful has been the home building plan for employees of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber company that the city of Akron, O., recently included the whole Goodyear tract in an annexation ordinance that has recently been passed, and Goodyear Heights is now a part of the city.

The plan was stared three years ago by President F. A. Seiberling, who felt that many of the 10,000 workmen desired to become home owners, but were barred by the "down payments" necessary in the usual real estate deal. Thereupon 100 acres of land were purchased close to the plant, the ground was allotted, streets laid out, paved, sewered, etc.; water, gas and electric light provided for and homes built and sold to workmen on the basis of rent, no down payment being necessary.

Most of the commonplace features of allotment development have been eliminated. There are no rows of houses all alike. Each is a real home, with architectural individuality—brick and stucco prevailing as to material.

A small lake partly within the property has made it possible to arrange a fine pleasure ground, with tennis courts, football and baseball fields, swimming and skating facilities and restful parks. Goodyear Heights already has a population close to 1,000 people, with school, church, stores and all the rest of the usual community trimmings. The tract is one of the show places of the city, and its fame has spread so that manufacturers from many parts of the country have made detailed inquiries, with a view to the possibility of adopting, in whole or part, similar housing plans.

PLAY FOR YOUNG AND OLD.

Recreation Is As Essential As Education Declares Chicago Expert.

Play and outdoor exercise are as necessary to the modern city dweller as is education, according to J. R. Richards, the Chicago superintendent of recreation. In a paper on the subject, prepared for the current issue of the American City, Mr. Richards urges that it is as much a duty of the government to provide facilities for both children and adults to play in and about cities as to provide adequate educational facilities.

American cities have approached the play problem in too haphazard a fashion, Mr. Richards declares. Most of the legislation on the subject, he says, has been passed without adequate study of the real needs of the public and from a restrictive rather than a constructive point of view. The public agencies in charge of recreation work have worked independently and with no common goal.

For children Mr. Richards suggests that the city should be districted and that the city government should provide a play leader for each district. The duty of the play leader would be to help all children who play in the street, to direct their play in the most beneficial channels and to guide them when there is opportunity to the nearest public recreation centers. He points out that even where there are recreation centers children may be found playing in the streets near by, particularly at hours when their parents have warned them not to get beyond "calling distance" from their homes. It is for this reason that the street leader is needed.

In speaking of the need of play for adults, the writer quotes Spencer in saying: "We stop playing not because we grow old. We grow old because we stop playing."

WARNING TO EMPLOYERS.

No Wage Cuts Allowed In Pennsylvania to Pay For Insurance.

The Pennsylvania state workmen's compensation board has adopted a ruling aimed at employers who endeavor to reduce wages to pay for compensation. The ruling was as follows:

"It is contrary both to the letter and spirit of the workmen's compensation act of 1915 for an employer to levy contributions upon his employees by reducing their wages or otherwise for the purpose of meeting his liability under the act."

An official statement issued by the chairman of the board on the subject says in part:

"Our board up to the present time has been extremely gratified by the spirit of thorough co-operation shown by the employers of the state toward the compensation law. In a very few instances rumors have reached us that some employers were preparing to meet the expense of carrying insurance, or the anticipated cost of compensation, by an enforced contribution from their employees, which, of course, amounts to nothing more or less than a reduction of wages to the extent of the contributions.

"The great benefit of compensation is the fact that the cost of injuries or deaths incident to the prosecution of industries is charged to the employer, so that ultimately that cost can be so equally shifted to the consumer that no one will feel the burden.

"We have adopted this rule as a warning and trust that our board will not be called upon to handle the question in any other way. If necessary we will undertake to protect the wage earner from this imposition by very drastic measures."

Oppose Eight Hour Day.

The problem of an eight hour day, which threatens to take 400,000 locomotive engineers, firemen, conductors and trainmen in the United States and parts of Canada out on strike, was considered at a recent meeting in New York city of representatives of all the eastern railroads. At its close a high official of the conference stated that the demand of the men, if granted, would mean huge financial loss and possible bankruptcy to some of the railroads, and that, unless radical amendments were enforced, it would therefore be refused when presented.

Match, Tossed Aside in Poorly Lighted Hall, Started the Williamsburg Fire.

FIRE ESCAPES NOT USED

Victims Suffocated While Asleep by Stifling Smoke in Three-Story Tenement

New York—A blowing match, carelessly tossed into a baby carriage standing in the hall, is believed to have started the fire in which thirteen persons lost their lives in the three-story tenement house in the rear of 66 North Sixth Street. Williamsburg, as told in The Times yesterday. Poor lighting in the hallways may have been an indirect cause of the fire, according to Tenement House Commissioner John J. Murphy.

As in more than 2,000 structures in the city, Commissioner Murphy said, kerosene lamps were used to light the halls. Often the lights go out or are turned out by 11 o'clock, so that persons who go into the buildings later are forced to strike matches to find their way. It probably was a match struck in this way that started the fire.—N. Y. Times, Jan. 22, 1916.

Building and Contents in Oneida Destroyed.

LOSS IS ABOUT $2,000

William Sharp, 86 Years Old, Let Lamp Fall and Had Difficulty in Escaping From Burning House — Newell J. Abbott the Owner.

Oneida, Jan. 22.—The house of Newell J. Abbott in Prospect street and practically all the contents were totally destroyed by fire shortly after 6 o'clock this evening. The loss is about $2,000. Combination No. 1 and company from the Central fire station responded to a still alarm, but owing to the house being located in Oneida county and a great distance from the nearest hydrant, all the firemen could do was to extinguish the sparks on roofs of nearby houses.

The fire originated on the first floor by the tipping over of a kerosene lamp. Fanned by a strong west wind, the flames spread rapidly and the cries of "fire" brought the neighbors from supper tables to assist in saving what they could. There was no chance to save the home, which was down within thirty minutes from the start of the fire.—Syracuse Herald.

PERJURY GROWS ON CALENDAR

More Than 10 Per Cent of State's Population Convicted of Some Form of Crime Last Year.

Albany.—Thirty residents of New York State, under oath stretched the truth last year, were found guilty of perjury and as a result became a part of the 82,540 men and women who were convicted of some crime or othe in courts of special sessions and courts of record. Figuring the State's population at a round ten millions, one out of every 121 persons was convicted of some sort of a crime during the year that ended October 31 1915. The annual report on criminal statistics for last year was given to the Legislature Monday night by Secretary of State Francis M. Hugo. All told there were 82,540 convictions for crime committed, 1,842 more than the previous year. The total in 1913 was 68,337.

The courts of record reported 10,158 ocnvictions for the year ending October 31, 1915, as against 9,088 in 1914, an increase of 1.070, No less than 72,382 convictions were reported were reported from courts of special sessions as compared with 71,610 the previous year. Of convictions in the latter court, females figured to the extent of 4.109; males, 68,273. There was but a difference of 13 in the number of women convicted in courts of record during the last two years, 427 being found guilty in 1915 as compared to 440 in 1914.

Every crime on the calendar is represented in the yearly report. Twenty-two were found guilty of murder in the first degree, as against 20 the year before, while second degree murders totaled 36 last year to 28 in 1914. No les than 596 "walking arsenals" were convicted. Dame Fortune turned her back on 31 gamblers when tried; 25 blackmailers heard the clang of the steel doors; nearly 2,000 burglars fell into the clutches of the law and were convicted. Fifteen escaped prisoners were nabbed; 3 kidnappers heard the word "guilty." 40 firebugs were nipped and sent over the road; 43 got into trouble on account of the bigamy law.

Eleven persons were convicted of conspiracy; 49 of extortion; 790 for assault in varying degrees; 145 for abandonment; 1,325 for larceny; 84 for manslaughter; 3,435 for misdemeanors. An even 406 wandered from the narrow path in receiving stolen goods and were convicted. There were 215 convictions for violation of thel iquor tax law; 10 of the health 11 of the election and 3 of the bank ing laws, while 13 persons, presumably all men, started riots and found themselves unlucky. Robbers footing to 271, were marched off to jail after being convicted.

WATERTOWN MAN CHASED BY HIS ICE BOAT

Watertown—Dr. Byron E. Noyes was chased over the ice in Chaumont bay by his ice boat Sunday and narrowly escaped being struck twice. The boat was left near the shore unattended for a few minutes when a gust of wind directed it towards the lake. Dr. Noyes followed it until the vagaries of the breeze changed the course of the boat toward him.

The wind was brisk and the boat come at a swift speed toward him. He dodged the craft and was proceding towards the shore when the direction of the boat again changed. Sprinting to the shore, the owner escaped for the second time what seemed to be a collison. The boat followed to the shore and the race was ended.

CITY ATTORNEY DECLARES LIGHTING CONTRACT VOID

property would undoubtedly be sold at a better figure if Mr. Distin's request was acceded to and a sewer built there, but realizing the financial situation as well as the difficulties which the Seward and Fremont st. property owners are experiencing, I recommend that the board show no favoritism. Fremont st. appeared to be the preference of theb oard. City Engineer Hill estimates that it will cost $800 to serve 10 houses, averaging $72 per house; while the Seward st. sewer will cost in the neighborhood of $500 and only three houses are served, at a cost of $166 for each. The work in Alderman Distin's ward would cost about $1,200, averaging $110 for each house, there being eleven houses abutting the proposed sewer.

Creditors May Have to Wait

Mr. Hillick stated that a summary of the city's financial condition will be presented to the Common Council very soon. With the report will appear the item of the pump upon which several thousand dollars are still due. Mr. Hillick requested the board to decide whether an immediate payment should be made in full, through a bond issue or otherwise, or whether the creditors should be asked to await payment in installments, said payments to be made through the receipts in the water department.

J. J. McGinnis's application for the transfer of the triangular strip of land in West 1st st., was accepted by the board. A resolution was introduced deeding the strip to him. Ther esolution was not made until all objections had been removed. Two property owners appeared before the board to oppose the transfer, but upon the nature of the application being fully explained the men became satisfied that they would not suffer any inconvenience, and they withdrew their objections.

As a result of the action of the board, Mr. McGinnis will immediately begin the erection of a brick building on the site of the structure which was destroyed by fire several weeks ago. The property owners who appeared to oppose the application understood that Mr. McGinnis desired a strip of land extending into West 1st st. They feared depreciation of their property by the extension of the building line. It was explained to these men that the site at present is 44 feet wide at the northern end and 22 feet at the southern end. No extension was asked for by MrGinnis at the northern end of the lot. The northern point on the West 1st st. front is to form the apex of a triangle, the base of which at the southern extremity will give the property a width of 30 feet instead of 22.

Mr. F. G. Dolbear, with a number of property owners in the vicinity of Worth and 1st sts., labored for the construction of the small park on that corner, made application to the board for more lights in that neighborhood. It was brought to the attention of the board that the same request has been made on various occasions in the past without result. It would be an impossibility to readjust the lighting system in that entire section, stated Mr. Jordan. There is still about $700 in the city's lighting fund available for the installation of new lamps, it was stated. It was the unanimous opinion of the board that a lamp should be placed at the park and Mr. Dolbear was promised decisive action in the near future. 2300 tulips are in the park which will blossom this Spring, Mr. Dolbear stated.

LATEST IDEA FOR BURGLAR ALARM

Rochester, N. Y.—The International Alarm Company, of Rochester, filed a certificate of incorporation with the county clerk last week. The company is capitalized for $100,000 dividend into 2,000 shares, and begins business with $100,000. The new company will put on the market a device designed to protect homes, safes, and even banks. The device is connected with a telephone and is put in operation by the disturbing of a desk, door, window or the like. By means of a four-minte motor a phonograph is started. It is connected directly with the telephone. With central answering, a call is put in for 59, police headquarters. There is a slight pause to give central an opportunity to raise police headquarters. Then, it being assumed that the police are on the line, the phonograph repeats for three minutes some such message as this: "there are burglars at John Doe's house, No. 312 Boulevard avenue! There are burglars at John Doe's house. No. 312 Boulevard avenue. Help! Police!"

The phonographic record can be made to say anything. A horn can be attached to the machine and words bellowed through it, in any part of a building, calculated to scare intruders away. In case of no telephone communications on the premises, the company plans to string wires to any given place. This could be done to protect country banks. The machine can be concealed in any part of a building or within a desk. The least jar of the connecting wires will set it in operation. It may also be started by means of a push button. Thus a person surprised could get into communication with the police without the knowledge of the intruder.

"W" advertised in The Evening Times last night, asking for a house of certain size. Seven replies were mailed to this office, to say nothing about the number of phone calls. adv

UNION THRIVED DURING CONTEST

Story of a Strike That Brought Solidarity to Toilers.

BEGAN WITHOUT MONEY.

Remarkable Success of the Chicago Clothing Workers In Their Recent Fight For Justice—Employers Refused to Submit to Arbitration. Fight Financed During Struggle.

After twelve long drawn out weeks the strike of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers in Chicago ended with victory for the toilers, says Graham Taylor in the Survey. Its dreariness and violence were enlivened by many picturesque scenes and lightened by not a little heroism. Although not all the shops represented in the Wholesale Clothing Manufacturers' association came to any agreement with their striking employees at once, the largest of them entered into negotiations, and Sidney Hillman, international president of the amalgamated association, sanctioned the return to work.

This virtually closed the strike. Some of the workers did not go back until their employers came to the agreement that has already been made with the majority of the shops' crews, but 15,000 strikers were in their old places shortly after the opening of the year.

It was difficult to get authentic information concerning the number of strikers and other controverted details. This has been due, on the one hand, to the unwillingness of the employers to hold any communication either with their striking employees or with representatives of the public and, on the other hand, to the fact that the workers were not thoroughly well organized. Their new unions, however, are in far better form than they were when the clothing workers successfully terminated their last great strike five years ago by the noteworthy agreement with Hart, Schaffner & Marx. Mr. Hillman, then one of the striking employees of this firm, helped to negotiate and operate that agreement.

The recent strike was called for little more than to secure for other shops the terms of that agreement, which has worked so satisfactorily to both parties in this largest manufacturing establishment in Chicago's clothing trade. The associated manufacturers would yield naught, however, to the success of their competitors, the independent manufacturers, in effecting that permanent basis for settling differences with their employees. Collective bargaining was, of course, demanded as indispensable to any such basis, but not the closed shop. This was denied consideration from the beginning of the strike until after the strikers went back to work.

As soon as the strikers had returned their shop committee went into conference with their employers to arrange the details of settlement. The union and its officials received no recognition thereby, yet the principle for which it struggled was recognized. The shops that have settled with their crews have conceded another claim of the strikers also—namely, the reduction from fifty-two to forty-eight hours a week without diminution of wages.

Mr. Hillman claims that the struggle was "the most successful strike ever waged against the association, which is the bitterest and strongest anti-union organization in the industry." And he added: "We have done something better than punish the enemy. We have infused a new solidarity among our people."

The employers' association issued no public statement. It refused in silence all appeals from public officials, groups of private citizens and its employees either to arbitrate or confer.

Perhaps the man most competent to estimate the outcome of this long struggle is John E. Williams, chairman of the board of arbitration established by the agreement between Hart, Schaffner & Marx and their employees, who acted in the same capacity under the protocol in the New York clothing trades. Says Mr. Williams, in part:

"I have been close to it from the beginning and think it was one of the best organized, best fought strikes ever pulled off in this country. Starting without money, the strikers raised $140,000 and spent it so well that scarcely a person suffered from actual hunger or want. They developed a wonderful loyalty and devotion among many different races and peoples and held them together with very few desertions to the end. They developed also a remarkable corps of commanders right out of the raw material on the spot."

Big Year For Labor.

An unusual year for labor—probably the most unusual in a generation—ended with 1915. For some of its earlier troubles the war in Europe was to blame. Its present problems are largely due to unprecedented prosperity. In New York city it closed with a statement from union sources that 200 business institutions had increased the pay of their employees, but this does not include the many independent concerns that were equally and in some cases even more generous.

From Boston, from Chicago, from the textile industries in New England and from other sections of the country come more notices of higher wages for the workers.

PROGRESS.

The only conceivable way in which there can be a permanent advance in civilization is by improvements in the condition of labor—greater rewards, shorter hours, better education and, in general, a healthier, happier life.

NO NEED OF COMPULSION.

American Workmen Will Aid Their Country Without Conscription.

The European war has taught this one fact—that people will fight for their country, whether that country stands as the embodiment of militarism and domination or whether it typifies and is the standard bearer of justice and democracy, says Samuel Gompers.

In Germany, Russia, France, Austria and Italy compulsory military service obtains. Great Britain has thus far relied upon voluntary military service and now proposes to press through parliament a species of compulsory service.

I entertained the hope Britain might have avoided this step; that the appeal for volunteers would have satisfied all that the country might ask. Though I am quite removed from the direct sources of information, a still greater concentrated effort in that direction would, in my opinion, prove effective.

For us in the United States to attempt, however, to sit in judgment upon either the governmental proposition or the trade union meeting declaration against conscription is not only purely academic on our part, but of questionable propriety, as well as a lack of good judgment, particularly if we entertain the hope to be of service later in the interest of peace.

It is easy for us so far removed from the field of action to assume the position of critics of either the one or the other proposition. The working people of Great Britain will do their duty, and there are no better representatives of the great masses of the people of Britain than are the trade unionists.

As to what position American organized labor would take in the event of our country's need must remain unquestioned. Their history of patriotic devotion in the struggle for the maintenance of the union and for the abolition of human slavery and during the Spanish-American war attests the loyalty and self sacrifices of America's workers.

Should the time ever come—and I pray that it may not—the toilers in our republic will give a good and honorable account of themselves, and this, too, without conscription, without compulsory military service.

FAVORS TRADE UNIONS.

Low Calls Employers Who Don't Recognize A. F. of L. Shortsighted.

Seth Low, who is chairman of President Wilson's coal commission, in a recent address at Denver said that the employer who failed to recognize the American Federation of Labor was shortsighted as to his own interests.

The tendency to combine is universal. It does not affect employers only nor employees only. It affects everybody, and each combines according to his own capacity and for his own aims. The combinations of labor are just as natural, just as inevitable, as the combinations of capital, and you will find that each kind of combination has been guilty of the same faults.

I want you to appreciate the difference in the aim between the American Federation of Labor, the Socialist party and the Industrial Workers of the World. The American Federation of Labor believes in the present organization of society. It accepts the institution of private property as the natural evolution of ages. The Socialists have a different aim. They do not believe in the right of private property, except as to personal belongings. They believe the state should own every instrumentality of production and transportation for the use of all. As a party they do not favor the use of violence.

I want you to understand that the great body of the American Federation of Labor is nonsocialistic, and I think that the manufacturer or business man who declines to treat with the American Federation of Labor in trying to develop working agreements is a very shortsighted man.

The Industrial Workers of the World proposition is that labor creates all values and therefore that no man, no capitalist, is entitled to anything he owns, and they wish to see labor take its property. They look forward to a time when labor will own everything, when there will be no capitalists whatever.

LABOR BRIEFS.

The Brotherhood of Railway Clerks has a membership of 4,630.

Carpenter and joiners paid death benefits amounting to $34,088 during December.

Strikers have been enjoined against interfering with the operation of the Wilkesbarre railway.

There are 10,000 members of the Ladies' Garment Workers union in Philadelphia, 95 per cent being women and girls.

Through arbitration the girls in the Herzog factory, Chicago, have received an increase in wages on garments from 10 to 40 per cent.

The payroll of the United States Steel corporation last year approximated $200,000,000. In 1914 it was $162,000,000 and in 1913 $207,000,000.

PURPOSES OF LABOR MOVEMENT

Places Greatest Emphasis Upon Fundamental Things.

SEEKS HUMAN BETTERMENT.

Shorter Workday, Higher Wages and Improved Conditions of Toil All Problems That Confront the Wage Earner—A Voluntary Organization Based Upon Democratic Principles.

The recent sessions of the American Federation of Labor convention at San Francisco were ample exemplification of the fact that the labor movement places the greatest emphasis upon fundamental things. The men of organized labor are not wanting in idealism, but they realize that ideals are useless without the means of making them effective. They know that conceptions of the higher development and the higher destiny of men and women are of no avail without the means and the opportunity to realize them. This explains the intenseness and the feeling that accompany discussions of the trade problems in America's labor congress.

These problems are intimately associated with daily life during seven days of the week and fifty-two weeks of the year. The shorter workday, better wages, better conditions of work, mean to the workers opportunities for better living and more living for themselves and their children and their children's children. The conditions that must be met in the industrial world are not of their own choosing, and often the methods that are used to meet and better these conditions are imposed by those in control in the industries.

Since the labor movement of America is a voluntary organization it must necessarily be based upon democratic principles. The voluntary element dominates the deliberations of the convention and the organization and policies of the movement.

In all the world there is nothing more democratic in conception and operation than the conventions of the A. F. of L. With the advantages and with the opportunities of democracy go also the mistakes incident to democracy. Democracy affords human nature the greatest opportunity for development—for development of selfish as well as altruistic characteristics. That the trade union movement, made up of men and women from every country of the world, who have brought here the traditions and the standards of other countries, has been able to weld out of this diverse cosmopolitan mass of workers an organization that expresses co-operation and unity, idealism and practical effectiveness, speaks volumes for the principles upon which the trade union movement is founded and for the practical effectiveness of the policies that it employs.

The representatives on the floor of this labor congress were a practical proof of what the movement has accomplished. They were men and women of ability and educated by the industrial life, trained by contact with human nature, and they were unerring in deciding all issues upon principles mindful of the voluntary nature of the organization and upon the welfare of the workers. With unfailing sagacity they rejected all proposals that would hamper the movement by compulsion or by division. They maintained the position of the unity of the interest of the workers and that loyalty to the cause of humanity demanded that all workers remain within the labor movement and endeavor to solve their difficulties and problems as members of the common organization.

The labor movement is engaged in a mass struggle. Incidentally there may be roughness, but the roughness is that of common humanity, and humanity is big enough to see beyond the roughness into the idealism that is the directing purpose.—American Federationist.

Asks Propaganda Inquiry.

An investigation by a select house committee of Labor's National Peace council and other organizations is demanded in a resolution introduced in congress by Representative Walter I. Hensley of Missouri, a "small navy" member of the committee on naval affairs. The council has been in the limelight recently because of indictments returned against certain persons connected with it by the federal grand jury in New York. Representative Buchanan, ex-president of the organization, which seeks an embargo on the shipment of war munitions to Europe, was among those indicted.

More Pay For Cotton Workers.

New Year announcements of an increase in wages were received by the 20,000 employees of the Amoskeag and Stark cotton mills, Manchester, N. H., directors of the two corporations having voted for the increase in line with the action of various other New England mills. The amount of the advance was not stated, but will probably be about 5 per cent.

New Year's Gift For Zinc Men.

The New Jersey Zinc company of Allentown, Pa., posted a notice at its plant Dec. 31 announcing that a bonus amounting to 10 per cent of their earnings would be awarded all employees as a New Year's gift. It is stated that $250,000 was distributed.

FOR THE BALL.

In Contrast to the Plain Exteriors and Gay Linings.

A GRACEFUL BACK.

This evening wrap is fashioned of coral colored brocade velvet, showing a fascinating Japanese pattern in fans and flowers. Below its scalloped bottom falls a straight band of satin in a weirdly oriental tone of blue. The neck is finished in gray fox. Reversing fashion's dictum of gay linings, this wrap wears its gorgeousness outside, being lined with a dull white satin.

used as centerpieces to build the pattern around. Full sets of work come in the scarf, a centerpiece and six small plate doilies. This scarf may be used for bureaus as well as sideboards.

COLISEUM FOR NEW YORK.

A Monster Building to Eclipse the Madison Square Garden.

A new and greater Madison Square Garden, the second largest structure of its kind in the world, is to go up within a block of New York's theatrical district.

Chicago capitalists have obtained an option on the Eighth avenue block between Forty-ninth and Fiftieth streets now covered by a car barn. The building will be known as the Coliseum and will be constructed primarily for the accommodation of the huge Panama canal model which has been on exhibition on the Zone at the San Francisco fair.

When arranged for the accommodation of circuses and similar shows the seating capacity of the Coliseum will be about 15,000. This is about three times that of Madison Square Garden.

With the Coliseum at its command, New York will be able for the first time in its history to compete for national political conventions. When the arena or central floor space is used, as will be the case with large meetings, the capacity will be between 25,000 and 30,000.

It is intended to keep the canal model at the Coliseum for about two years. At the end of that time the building will be remodeled and made the big show place of the city.—New York Tribune.

A Picture of the Belgian King.

The king of the Belgians is not at all what the public imagines him to be. He is not in any sense a dashing soldier, nor does he ever look like one. He is a quiet young man who might pass for an Oxford don or a student of science. He has very fair hair, which never responds to the brush, but is always untidy in a rather pleasing manner, and a light complexion which becomes entirely pink when he is hot or shy. He is nearsighted and generally wears glasses, which give a certain staring effect to his blue eyes. His jaw is heavy and suggests tenacity, but his face is lightened by the frank and boyish eyes and noble forehead. He is tall and rather heavily built.—Delineator.

Astronomical Discoveries.

The particular universe of stars in which we dwell is half again as large in scale as the world has been supposing. Our own sun is still youthful and keeps traveling northwardly through space at the comparatively leisurely pace of twelve miles per second, or only two-thirds the average speed of stars of its own class. The north star is not really a single star, but triple, consisting of three suns revolving about a common center. These are some of the recent discoveries of the Lick observatory, the famous graduate astronomical department of the University of California.

Swat the Fly.

"Now's the time to do a lot of your next summer's fly swatting," says Edward J. Hatch, chairman of the American fly fighting committee. "Don't think a fly is dead because he is lying around stiff with cold," says Mr. Hatch. "He is just playing 'possum' and will revive and retire to his hiding place as soon as he is warm. Swat him, or, better still, if there are a number of them sweep them up and consign them to the furnace or kitchen stove. Make it hot for them now or they will turn the trick next summer."

Two Busy Corners.
